M. A. NICOLE states that he has succeeded in producing telescopic reflecting mirrors cheaply and easily by the electroplating process. He takes the mold of a concave surface, made of a mixture which is either an electrical conductor itself, or else a non-conductor metallized by the aid of nitrate of silver and phosphorus dissolved in sulphide of carbon. In either case the mold is plunged in a bath of galvanic silver, where the current, conducted very slowly to the mold, determines a deposit of excellent quality. When the silver has reached a thickness of 0.015 inch, the bath of that metal is replaced by one of copper, so as to obtain a solid backing. The mold is then dissolved or melted and the mirror removed, nothing further being necessary than a light polishing. M. Nicole adds that he has produced perfect mirrors of four inches in diameter in this manner.

PROF. LANGLEY, of Pittsburg, has discovered a spot on the sun, which he describes as of unusual magnitude, and says it is visible to the naked eye through a smoked glass. It may be seen on the western limb of the sun, and has the appearance of a small cloud. The telescope reveals that over forty smaller spots have united to form the large one, and that its length is somewhat over eighty-five thousand miles, while the entire spot covers sixteen hundred millions of square miles. Throughout this extent the surface is broken up and tossed into every form into which the solar cyclones can distort the intensely brilliant matter on which they act. Curvilinear outlines, peculiar to these whirlwinds, predominate, and the intricacy and beauty of their shapes are described as being beyond comparison with any of the cloud-forms of our own atmosphere, as they are also more definite in outline. The professor says some are crystal-like in the precision of their details; but while the crystalline patterns which the frost traces on our window-panes are not more beautiful or definite, they cannot rival the vivid splendor of these solar forms, or bring up the impression we gain when we observe that, vast as the real dimensions must be, they are shifting and passing into new shapes from hour to hour, and even visibly changing while we gaze.

A PAPER was read recently by Lieutenant Colonel A. Strange, F. R. S., inspector of scientific instruments to the Indian government, on "The Necessity for Placing Physical Meteorology on a Rational Basis." With regard to the sun's force and records of the solar spots he says: "In a given locality, on a given date, the sun, to which we ascribe so predominating an influence, attains, year after year, the same elevation above the horizon, and, being at the same distance, presents the same angular area. If the sun, as that date annually recurs, were in all other respects the same, we should have a right to expect annual recurrence of the same weather, unless some disturbing cause, of which we have at present no knowledge, were known to exist. I do not say positively that the sun being a constant force, we should have this constancy in the seasons; but what I do say is that if the sun be not a constant force we have no right to expect constancy in the seasons. The first question, therefore, should be: Is the sun a constant force? Does it, year after year, at the same date, present the same unvaried surface? We know that the contrary is the case. We know that the surface of the sun's disk is never free from spots, and that these spots are constantly changing in number, size and position; we know that, whatever law may govern them, their period of change and return is certainly not annual. We know also that the general surface of the sun is covered with markings called facnlæ, which are perpetually changing, and which have not an annual period. We have also learned, within two or three years, by the aid of the spectroscope, how at any time to examine the exterior gaseous envelope of the sun, which formerly could only be seen during a total eclipse, and we now know that the famous red prominences of which on those rare occasions we obtained only a fleeting glimpse, on being studied at our ease, without interruption, reveal evidence of activity in those regions of the most stupendous sublimity, darting out, in a few seconds, flames many thousands of miles in extent. Further, in examining the spectrum of the solar light with improved spectroscopes, assisted by photography, we find that thousands of lines exist there of which hitherto we had no knowledge; and quite recently the researches of Norman Lockyer tend to throw a doubt on the fixity and constancy of some of these lines. We have here evidence which conclusively proves that the sun's surface and surroundings are not maintained in a constant condition. The evidence may not justify us in asserting that as his surface changes, so must the force which he pours out on the earth necessarily change also; but it certainly justifies us in entering on a systematic examination of that question with the appliances which modern physical astronomers have contrived for the purpose."

AN impassioned swain, under a bad spell, wrote: "Mary, I love thee well." She replied that she was glad he didn't drink liquor.

New Orleans Markets.

From the New Orleans Price Current.

The river is 8 feet 9 inches below high-water mark.

COTTON.—The following are the arrivals since the nineteenth instant:

Mississippi river and bayous	3,310
Red river	4,384
Arkansas river	1,572
Ouachita river	3,215
Railroads	2,692
Mobile	1,259
Texas	200
Total	16,614

On Saturday the market opened with a good inquiry, which was discouraged by a telegram from New York to the Cotton Exchange, reporting that marked "heavy" at previous quotations, but a subsequent dispatch having noted that the word intended to be used was "hardening," the movement soon became more active, and 2,000 bales changed hands during the morning at irregular prices, a part of the business showing no variation, and the rest an improvement of ⅛c., after which the movement became more active, especially toward the close, resulting in additional sales of 6,700 bales, making a total of 8,700 bales. On Monday, although the general movement was restricted by the banks and Cotton Exchange being closed, with no regular dispatches from Liverpool or New York, yet the market opened with a fair inquiry, and up to noon 1,800 bales had changed hands, partly at Saturday's advance and partly at an improvement of ⅛c., after which buyers became still more stringent in their pretensions, but, as the demand continued strong, further sales were effected to the extent of 3,450 bales, at prices still more in favor of factors, making a total of 5,250 bales, the market closing strong at an advance of ⅛@¼c. On Tuesday the movement exhibited but little activity, and the day's business, as far as reported, was confined to 4,350 bales, the closing rates requiring an advance of only ⅛c in the inside figures of some grades and the outside of others.

The above makes an aggregate for the past three days of 18,600 bales, against 19,250 the corresponding time last week and 17,250 the week before.

The receipts proper at this port since the first of September, exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas, are 826,131 bales, against 867,207 bales to the same date last year, and the decrease in the receipts at all the ports up to the latest mail dates, as compared with last year, is 95,116 bales. The decrease by the reports per telegraph is 405,417—2,888,929 against 2,994,346. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same date last year, there is an increase of 99,379 bales to Great Britain, and a decrease of 54,856 to France and 62,484 to other foreign ports. Advertisers' Directory

OF THE

NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

Alphabetically Arranged Under the Heads of the Business or Articles Advertised.

NOTE.—We take no advertisements except from those who we have good reason to believe are respectable and reliable. The publisher urges his solicitor and agents to seek the advertisements of the most worthy and reliable representatives in every branch of business, and not to apply to or accept business from persons of doubtful character. We have refused business to the extent of thousands of dollars each year for want of satisfactory information in reference to applicants. We think we may safely claim for the list below that it embraces, as a rule, the very best men and firms in the different branches represented.

COUNTRY ORDERS.

1875. - - SPRING---SPRING. - - 1875.

Parties residing in Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Arkansas and Adjacent States, who buy their

DRY GOODS FOR CASH,

Are invited to send to us for SAMPLES, which will be forwarded to them

FREE OF COST AND POSTAGE PAID,

and where we are favored with orders that exceed $10, the Freight Thereon will be Prepaid at our Expense. Where the Order Exceeds $20 we will Pay the Cost of Sending the Money to us, Whether by Express, Money Order, Registered Letter, Bank Draft or otherwise.

The new postal law permits parcels weighing four pounds or less to be sent by mail at the rate of one (1) cent for every two (2) ounces or fraction thereof, so that parties ordering less than $10 worth can have their purchases sent to them through their postoffices at a very slight expense. Parties sending to us for samples should be careful to write their names and addresses as plainly as possible, and where they desire packages sent by mail they should make provision for the postage unless the order exceeds $10, when it will be forwarded at our cost. The Postage on Parcels must be Prepaid.

Goods sent C. O. D. to all points where the Express Company or Packets have Agents.

As a Matter of Accommodation we will purchase articles outside of our line, which is confined to Fancy and Staple Dry Goods, but we do not pay the freight thereon unless the order for Dry Goods exceeds $10. For instance, if a party orders a piece of cotton $6, and a hat $5, the order would not be entitled to have the freight paid by us; but if the order was for a piece of cotton $6, a dress pattern $5, and a hat, or any other article not in our line, $10, the freight would be prepaid on the whole. We make no charges for purchasing articles to a limited extent, and always do the best we can for our patrons.

Articles not corresponding to order can be Returned at our Expense.

Should we not be able to fill the order, the money will be Returned at our Expense.

We make no charge for Cases, Boxing, Strapping, Drayage or Insurance.

Orders should be addressed to the firm to insure prompt attention. The personal attention of one of the partners is given to country orders. We have been in business

News of the Week.

DOMESTIC.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 19.—The President has issued a proclamation calling the Senate in extra session at twelve o'clock, March 5.

NEW YORK, Feb. 24.—The Brooklyn city court-room was crowded this morning, when General Tracy opened in Beecher's defense. All parties to the suit were early in their places.

Tracy devoted much eloquence on behalf of Beecher, who, he said, took his stand alone, but supported by his God and the justice of his character. He alluded to his prominence as a supporter of the Union at the commencement of the late war, which, he said, won the admiration of the whole world. One of the most striking characteristics of the man was a profound and earnest interest in young men. This prosecution was the reward he received for the love and devotion he had lavished upon a young man. Counsel related the history of Tilton, and dwelt upon his being a deist and denunciating the marriage relation as a fraud, and hindering the advancement of the world.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 25.—Messrs. Burke and Leonard have left for home.

Mr. Zacharie remains, and will present the letter of acceptance from the Conservative caucus. He will remain until the adjournment, witness the course of arbitration, and then leave for New Orleans with Mr. Wheeler, to carry out the compromise.

The adjustment meets with favor by all Louisianians here as the best obtainable.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 25, 1875.

To Messrs. Hoar, Wheeler, Poller, Rose, Phelps, Marshall and Foster, members of Congressional Committee on Louisiana:

Gentlemen—We have the honor to inform you that the Conservative caucus has accepted the plan for settlement of existing political difficulties in Louisiana, known as the Wheeler propositions, subject to two conditions:

1. That all the members of our committee shall act as arbitrators.

2. That there shall be an extra session of the General Assembly of Louisiana on the fourth Monday in March to give practical effect to the award when made, and to consider and pass upon certain reform measures absolutely essential to the peace and prosperity of the State.

In announcing the acceptance we desire to state that it is given under protest, and that we have been reluctantly forced to the conclusion that as other terms would be obtained. It is evident that if rejected the people of Louisiana had either to submit directly to an undoubted usurpation or to plunge the State into a condition of anarchy, in which event they were warned they would be unrelentingly used by the Federal authorities. Under these circumstances the propositions have been accepted, but in the name of a once free people we solemnly protest against the terrible wrongs which have made that acceptance a bitter necessity. The rights of our people can only be vindicated, if ever vindicated, by the action of the American people, who may find too late that their own liberties have perished with those of Louisiana.

E. A. BURKE,
A. H. LEONARD,
F. C. ZACHARIE,
Committee representing Conservative Members of the General Assembly of Louisiana.

RALEIGH, Feb. 25.—J. William Thorn, a native of Chester county, was expelled from the Legislature for promulgating disbelief in God and other heresies, by a vote of 46 to 31. The motion was introduced by colored members.

KNOXVILLE, Feb. 25.—The water is five feet below the great flood of 1867. Many houses and bridges destroyed. The weather is still threatening. Inundated mills in all directions have been swept away.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 26.—The Republicans of the Mississippi investigating committee signed one report; the Democrats signed another. The majority report closes with the recommendation for the passage of the caucus force bill, and that the violent action at Vicksburg justifies Governor Ames in calling on President Grant for troops.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 27.—The committee to sit during the recess to examine the various branches of the civil service will consist of Messrs. Boutwell, Conkling, Merrimon, Eaton and Allison.

Resolutions of the Mississippi Legislature in favor of the Texas Pacific subsidy were presented.

The civil rights bill finally passed and goes to the President.

An amendment relieving Southern jurors of the iron-clad oath was defeated. Mr. Logan said he would vote in favor of relief as a separate measure, but to amend the civil rights bill would defeat it. The vote was strictly party, except Sprague, Schurz and Tipton. Many senators were absent. The vote stood 38 to 26.

SALT LAKE, Feb. 27.—The court allows Anna Eliza, who is suing Brigham Young for a divorce, $3000 for lawyer's fees, and $500 per month pending trial, which Brigham is ordered to pay into court.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 28.—In the House the force bill passed shortly after midnight, amended to limit the President's right to suspend habeas corpus to Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana and Arkansas, and to expire at the end of two years. The bill passed by a vote of 135 yeas to 114 nays.

Before the last vote was taken on the passage of the bill, Mr. Young, of Georgia, said he desired the country to know one fact: that out of the forty Democratic representatives from the States to be affected by the provisions of this bill, not one of them has been allowed a word in discussion upon its merits; but, on the contrary, the gentleman in charge of it has thought proper to deny time to any of the representatives from the Southern States who intended to oppose the bill, except a few minutes to two or three of them.

It may be stated that Democratic senators are determined that the caucus force bill, which passed the House this morning, shall not be allowed to reach the President. Concessions, they say, are over.

WASHINGTON, March 1.—The President signed the civil rights bill.

The following is the fifth and last section of the civil rights bill:

Section 5. That all cases arising under the provisions of this act in the courts of the United States shall be reviewable by the Supreme Court of the United States, without regard to the sum in controversy, under the same provisions and regulations as are now provided by law for the review of other causes in said court.

CINCINNATI, March 1.—The Commercial's Bridgeport (Ala.) special says the greatest flood that has visited that section since Noah's, with one exception, is now sweeping down the Tennessee valley. All the low ground about Chattanooga is submerged, and there is great loss of property.

Every railroad leading into the city is badly washed, and whole sections submerged. The East Tennessee road is out in twenty places. The Atlanta road has lost many bridges. The Memphis and Charleston road is under water for miles, and has lost heavily in bridges. The Nashville road is also a great sufferer. The great bridge across the Tennessee at Bridgeford is in danger, but as it is heavily weighed down with loaded cars it is thought that it may be saved.

The river is still rising slowly. Destruction in fences, stock and houses, for three hundred miles, up and down, is very great—probably the greatest ever known, with the possible exception of a flood eight years ago.

WASHINGTON, March 2.—Morton is going to tack the force bill on to the civil appropriation bill, which it will kill. You may possibly have Billings for district judge. They are sending charges against him as being identified with certain rings. This always precedes nominations. Grant likes rings.—Picayune.

Lieutenant Governor Penn, of Louisiana, was introduced to the President to-day by Governor Hebert. The interview was unusually long. The President concluded by saying to Governor Penn that he was desirous that the people down there should make some compromise in the interests of peace, and assured Governor Penn that such a compromise would have his personal support, but it was his business to administer the laws.

An amendment to the tariff bill, to tax tea and coffee ten cents per pound, was lost by a vote of 6 yeas to 56 nays.

Mr. Johnson's amendment, excepting tobacco already manufactured from the operation of the increased tax, was adopted by a vote of 18 to 26.

Mr. Jones then moved to lay the bill on the table, which was carried by a vote of 30 to 29.

ALEXANDRIA, VA., March 2.—In consequence of the civil rights bill, and fearing trouble, both the principal hotels here have canceled their licenses and closed.

FOREIGN.

LONDON, Feb. 24.—Gladstone has published a pamphlet on Vaticanism in reply to Dr. Newman and Archbishop Manning. He maintains his original assertions; eulogizes Newman, whose secession is the greatest loss since Wesley; acknowledges the loyalty of the mass of Catholics is unchanged; refutes Manning's assertion that claims the Vatican decrees, and points to declarations repudiating doctrines of papal infallibility and temporal power, by which the English and Irish Catholics obtained full civil liberty.

THE SEPOY PUNISHMENT.—Prof. Seelye, in a recent lecture, gave a different explanation of the terrible punishment of blowing Sepoys from the cannon's mouth from that which is understood. He said: "It is well for us to understand, when we see the papers, as they occasionally do, taking up the subject of English barbarity, what is the meaning of this 'barbarity.' I have found persons who supposed the punishment of firing Sepoys from a cannon's mouth meant that Sepoys were actually put inside the cannon and fired out. In reality the victim was put about six feet in front of the cannon, which was heavily loaded with powder alone; and I was told that no person unfamiliar with artillery would have any idea of the minuteness of the fragments into which the body was scattered. This was a great punishment, not on account of the death, or of the manner of death, but because the body was scattered, and denied the rites of burial. This is a terrible thing for a Hindoo, and the English report and believe that a rebellion was stopped there just by the sturdy statement of an English officer, who said that if there were any signs of mutiny he would subject all mutineers to this punishment, and it cannot be doubted that this punishment was the most salutary one so far as affected the success of England."

From the Work.

OCEAN SPRINGS, MISSISSIPPI.—Mr. Editor: We have just held (February 27 and 28) the first quarterly meeting, at Ocean Springs, for the Ocean Springs station and the Handsboro mission. We had a pleasant and, we trust, a profitable time. We were pleased to find the church so beautifully improved. It is not only neat and comfortable, but is now an ornament to the town. It was improved through the instrumentality and liberality of that venerable patriarch of Galveston, Texas—David Ayers—whose son and grandson reside here. The preachers appointed to Ocean Springs station and Handsboro mission having failed to take charge of their works, we are happy to say that our old and tried fellow-laborer, Rev. J. Nicholson, whose home is here, and whose health has greatly improved—although granted a superannuated relation—has consented, under this stress, to take pastoral oversight of both charges; at which the people generally, as well as the officers and members of the church, seem to be gratified. May his health be permanently restored. The district is in a peaceful and healthy state.

Yours in Christ,
C. F. GILLASPIE.

MARCH 1, 1875.

RALEIGH CIRCUIT, BRANDON DISTRICT, MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.—Mr. Editor: The first Quarterly Conference of the Raleigh circuit, Brandon district, was held at Raleigh, Smith county, on the sixth and seventh of February, 1875, W. B. Rhues in the chair, who presided over the Conference with ability, giving perfect satisfaction in all his deliberations, and preached on Saturday and Sunday to the satisfaction of the audiences. After the sermon on Sunday the sacrament was administered to a number of communicants, who felt the love of God in their hearts. We took up a collection for the Bishops, and received forty-five cents over half the assessment. I had visited all my appointments before the first Quarterly Conferences, and met with a warm reception from the brethren on the circuit. I found many who were alive to religion and to the interests of the church, though they are generally poor people. The finances come up slowly, yet we believe that the hearts of the people are fully in the cause of Christ. I believe that the stewards will be energetic in their collections, and that the people of the Raleigh circuit will respond to the calls and wants of the minister as well as their ability will admit of. Our prayer for them is that the Lord will bless them in basket and store this year; that he will give us health and strength to do the work assigned to us as a faithful minister in the Lord, and that we may have a great revival all round the circuit.

JOHN H. EVANS, P. C.

UTILIZING WHALES.—It could hardly be otherwise, and the "divine fitness of things" still exist. It was all well enough, when whales were necessary to the light of the world, that they should be killed for their blubber; but now in the days of coal oil and gas, when the incentive to whaling is nearly gone, it seems almost right that a new utility should be found for these monsters of the deep. To the philosophers who have been racking their brains and pondering on this great waste of power, a little paragraph published in a Halifax newspaper must open a world of light. This luminous statement is to the effect that on the twenty-third of November the American fishing schooner Sultan, while riding at anchor on the Grand Banks, with one hundred and fifty fathoms of cable out, was taken in tow at the rate of twelve knots an hour by a whale which had become entangled in the cable. After an hour and a half the monster was cut loose, and got his harness for his pains. This might be the germ of a great discovery. Why should not whales do service in the sea in the same way as horses on the land? We can fancy some New Bedford mariner, who has made the habits of the whale the study of his life, training a school of young monsters. First, to test their utility, he might try them with a small boat; but to find out their power he must ship aboard a fishing schooner and hitch one of his immense steeds to the anchor. The plan is perfectly practicable. All that is necessary is to form a stock company, buy up Coney Island for a stable, and make application for the privilege of taking the merchant marine to and fro. "There's millions in it."—New York Tribune.

THE eccentric revivalist, Lorenzo Dow, once preached a sermon on the text from St. Paul: "I can do all things." "No, Paul," he said, "you are wrong for once. I'll bet you $5 you can't," and he laid down a $5 bill on the desk. He continued to read: "Through Jesus Christ our Lord." "Ah, Paul," he said, "that's a very different thing. The bet's off."

BIOGRAPHY has been called the picture gallery in the halls of history. History properly is only the record of the result on society and the world of the doings of men. Biography introduces us into the house of the interpreter, and explains the springs by which the operations are carried on and their consequences evolved.

The Eucalyptus Globulus.

A WONDERFUL TREE.

The Revue des Deux Mondes for January 1 contains an interesting article on the eucalyptus globulus, or blue gum of Tasmania. It will be read with disappointment, however, by cultivators of the tree in this country who hope to obtain some light on the climatic conditions essential to its flourishing away from its native seat. The writer, M. Planchon, insists on the distinction that trees may be naturalized, but not acclimated. They will either grow or not grow in a given locality, and experience alone can determine what region is suitable for them. Nor is there necessarily a reciprocity in this naturalization of plants and vegetables. From England, for example, numerous wild and cultivated plants have passed to Australia and thriven there, though generally deteriorating; but not a single Australian species has yet been propagated in England outside of ornamental gardens, where they are cultivated by thousands. Even in southern Europe and northern Africa all that can be said of the eucalyptus is that it has been introduced, but not yet naturalized—in other words, it still requires the care of man. The experience of the Cape of Good Hope, the Argentine Republic, of Cuba and California, is passed over by M. Planchon, who confines his attention to the shores of the Mediterranean. In Algiers the giant tree has prospered wonderfully, and already has given a new character to the landscape. Twenty years ago it grew there unknown, but cultivation on a large scale and with a purpose was not attempted till 1861–62. It now lines the railroads and highways, and is observable singly, in clumps and in groves, so that it seems like part of the indigenous vegetation. In the south of France it thrives only where the orange-tree does without artificial shelter—i. e., in the eastern Pyrenees, the Var and the Maritime Alps, the best-known sites being Hyeres, Cannes, Antibes, Nice, Villefranche and Monaco. Open-air cultivation has been tried at Montpellier, Marseilles and Narbonne, but not without great risks and disappointments, and M. Planchon decides adversely on the climate of Languedoc and even of the western portion of Provence.

In our Southern States the chief hope reposed in the eucalyptus is that it will overcome miasmata, and not without reason. The "fever-tree" is the name given it in Spain, by the people of Valentia, from a practical acquaintance with its properties. Not only does it absorb immense quantities of moisture from swampy soils, and give off a balsamic effluvium, but it furnishes the materia medica with a substance which is a febrifuge in the case of a large number of intermittent fevers; it has disinfecting and antiseptic qualities; topically applied to wounds, it prevents cicatrizing; its leaves in a moderate infusion will supply the place of tea as a stimulating beverage, and rolled into cigarettes they have a soothing effect on the respiratory organs. Prosper Merimee is said, in his last illness at Cannes, to have derived benefit in this way from the smoking of them. The eucalyptus essence has also been administered for bronchial affections in the form of lozenges; and a toilet article, of a powerful and very persistent odor, has been made of it. Great as are these uses, the tree is perhaps still more to be welcomed for its timber. Its rapid growth is not incompatible (as is usually the case) with a compact texture, whose value is heightened by the presence of resinous substances, eminently adapting the wood to resist salt water, and to play an important part in naval architecture. For the same reason it does not rot in the soil, and is used for railway sleepers, for posts and piles, for bridges, viaducts, etc. Some of the allied species of the eucalyptus globulus are taller than it is, though mention is made of a blue gum plank nearly one hundred and seventy feet long. A single eucalyptus amygdalina has been known to surpass in height the Strasburg spire, and even the Great Pyramid. For further particulars respecting the subject of this note we must refer to M. Planchon's article, which is remarkable, considering that the author is a Frenchman, in suggesting how certain peculiarities of the blue gum lend support to the development theory of the natural creation.—New York Nation.

A Card.

I am the only son of one of six brothers and one sister. My grandfather's name was William, and grandmother's Frances Stone. They had, as well as I recollect, six sons and one daughter, whose names were respectively: William, Tilman, Jackson, James, Coburn, Maburn and Nancy. Aunt Nancy first married a Rochello, and afterward a Forrester. My father married a Miss Rachel C. Etheridge, who was related to the Warrens, Yerks, etc. My father was related to the McCollochs, Culpeppers, Magnesses, etc. Now any information concerning the whereabouts of any of my connections would be thankfully received by

The Southern Review.

MR. EDITOR: Many thanks for the very kind and considerate insertion, in your journal, of the notice relating to the Southern Review, which appeared in the St. Louis Christian Advocate of January 27.

By an amicable arrangement between Mr. Dameron and myself the Southern Review has been returned to my hands, and will be hereafter published in Baltimore, Maryland. The notice of this fact was forwarded to St. Louis with the last batch of articles for publication in the Review, with the special request that it should be inserted. We are extremely sorry that this request was overlooked. The Southwestern Book and Publishing Company will hereafter have no further connection with the Southern Review than will other booksellers who may wish to aid in its sale and circulation. It is the sole property of the editors, Mrs. S. Bledsoe Herrick and myself, who will continue to conduct it without any the least change in its programme or principles.

All moneys due for the year 1875, including the January number, should be forwarded to Mrs. S. Bledsoe Herrick, 34 McCullough street, Baltimore, and not to the former publishing house in St. Louis. We beg subscribers to remit as soon as they conveniently can, if not sooner, as our money affairs have been somewhat deranged by the sudden and unexpected change above mentioned. The April number is now in the printer's hand, and partly through the press, with the assurance that it will be issued by the first day of that month.

We are exceedingly glad to have our Review back again. We now can and will have it issued punctually when due; and, besides, we shall no longer be distressed, as we have so often been, by the "monstrous" mistakes in proof-reading, which have been incident to its publication so far away from us. In the last number, for example (page 181,) we wrote these words: "Hail to thee, O thou illustrious John, of Noyon!" meaning to speak, as we have always done, most respectfully and reverently of John Calvin. But yet the printer, or the "printer's devil," has made us say: "Hail to thee, O thou Monstrous John, of Noyon!" Evidently mistaking our two small ll's for a large M, he has converted our "illustrious" hero into a "Monster." What could be more distressing? Yet this is only one of the many blunders which, in times past, have vexed our souls.

Finally, as the Review, in passing through the press, will also pass through our hands, so we can adjust the space for book notices to suit us, which, for the want of timely information, we have heretofore found it impossible to do. Accordingly we can and will very greatly improve this most important feature of the Review.

P. S.—We shall be much obliged to the editors of our church papers if they will be so kind as to insert the above notice in their columns.

Nashville Christian Advocate.

A CORRESPONDENT who attended the third anniversary of the Plymouth church Chinese Sunday school in San Francisco gives an interesting account of the exercises in the Advance. An original address in English was delivered by Jee Gam, of which the following is a part:

"If you were to go to China you would find that the people have no Sabbath, no churches, no Sunday schools, except the few that were recently established by Christian missionaries. You would find no public schools except universities. You would see temples scattered throughout the whole empire. You would at once perceive that the people were worshipers of idols. Their religion is similar to that of the ancient Greeks and Romans, for they believe there are three classes of deities—the celestial, the marine and the infernal. Besides these three there are inferior kinds of gods, such as the god of education, of war, of mountains, rivers, roads, farms, horses, doors and everything you can think of. Each person is controlled by his peculiar god. But the highest of all gods dwells in the heavens and is Shang Di, which means the highest being, and is considered as the creator of heaven and earth. The highest that lives in the sea is Hoy Loony, and the highest that lives in the infernal regions is Yum Loo. Moreover, the people worship their ancestors as well as their divinities. They have so much superstition that they dare not go abroad, or build a house, or open a store, or begin anything of that sort without the consent of one or more gods. Now, my friends, I feel very sorrowful whenever I reflect upon their condition, because of their foolishness and their ignorance of the only true God. I feel sad and wretched because of their darkness and superstition. They need the word of God to enlighten their path, and his Holy Spirit to lead them out of darkness. Nevertheless, I feel rejoiced immediately when I think of the love which you and your friends have been manifesting toward us by instructing us in the word of life. I feel encouraged by the upright example which you have set before us in the name of Jesus. Those are the feelings which I have formed by coming to America. I boast and consider that I have found these things, which are far above the value of gold that I came to find. I boast and publicly declare my intention to do my share toward leavening our country with the leaven of Christ, and I have both seen and heard many of these young men express themselves in the same manner. As I said, I feel rejoiced because there are six Chinese mission schools in this city, and eleven Sunday schools. The number who attend these schools is about six hundred, and two hundred and thirty of them have been converted to the true faith. Six from our own mission were baptized to-day, and added to the Bethany church. The time will be when they will come not only in six, but by hundreds; aye, even by thousands, as we read in the Acts about the Pentecost season. The time will come when every idol shall be discarded and its temple converted into a Christian church, for there is no loss in working for Christ."

The Evils of Pulpit Notoriety.

A secular journal moralizes over the confession of a prominent witness, in a certain trial, that in his younger days he worshiped great men, but that since he had come to know them better he was "sick" of them. The journalist seems in his moralizing to make no distinction between the varieties of great men, but puts them all into one catalogue. As Macbeth says: "Hounds and greyhounds, mongrels, spaniels, curs, shoughs, water-rugs and demi-wolves, are clept all by the name of dogs." He mentions Alexander, Cæsar, Washington and Hamilton in connection with the particular "great men" by whom this witness in his youthful and immature years had been dazzled, as if such a juxtaposition were not ridiculous.

And yet this journalist is only repeating the vulgar error of confounding notoriety with fame. Because an individual happens to be the town talk, unthinking persons suppose that he thereby goes into history, and becomes the theme of admiration for a nation or for mankind. Nothing is easier than to get notoriety, and nothing is more difficult than to acquire fame. The arts that promote the former defeat the latter. He who would gain a lasting reputation in any department of human effort must cultivate his powers so highly and exert them so conscientiously as to preclude the indiscriminating and noisy applause of a narrow circle of relatives, friends and dependents. Notoriety always supposes more or less of personal acquaintance and relationship; fame supposes none at all. A noted politician, or a noted actor, or a noted preacher, derives his reputation from the crowd that gathers about him when he makes a public appearance, and the celebrity which he enjoys is due to individual traits and peculiarities, more than to those solid excellencies that remain the same for all time and under all circumstances.

It is here that the evil influence of mere pulpit notoriety upon the church and society is apparent. The declamatory and sensational preacher gathers around him only a particular class. It is a class marked by defects that require to be removed rather than strengthened. They are commonly the very same defects which the preacher has himself. Like priest, like people. He abhors doctrine, and they abhor it. He talks metaphors, relates anecdotes and raises laughter, and they like metaphors, anecdotes and laughter. He favors loose and easy-going ethics, and they enjoy the same. In this way the preacher speedily becomes the "great man" of his congregation, and then,

"Like Cato, gives his little senate laws,
And sits attentive to his own applause."

The injurious effect of notoriety upon the individual himself who is so unfortunate as to have it is manifold. It is almost fatal to personal piety. Those devout and saintly men in the history of the church have not been local celebrities. No deep and pure character is formed under the intoxicating stimulus of a crowd of partisans. On the contrary, infirm virtue, sad lapses and great scandals are apt to come in connection with such influences. The effect upon the preacher in puffing him up with self-conceit is remarkable. It is very difficult for him to think others better than himself, and to condescend to men of low estate. The story is told of a popular member of a French parliament who, being overcome by his own eloquence, was overheard after his speech muttering devoutly to himself: "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation." This extravagance in secular oratory can be matched in the records of ecclesiastical. Some preachers have had as absurd notions of their own superiority as this French deputy had, and some congregations have been as crazy about their idol.

It is a dark day for a church, and it betokens great spiritual decline, when the people cease to be content with thoughtful, devout and scriptural teaching, and clamor for celebrated preachers. The demand will create the supply, and the church will be filled with declaimers and ecclesiastical charlatans. There will be no truly great men produced; and, what is far worse, no truly good men. There will be abundance of notoriety, but no fame; and, what is worse, no piety. In thus foolishly and wickedly trying to find their life, both the preachers and the people will have lost it.—Christian Intelligencer.

THE CHURCH'S WAR SONG.

Sounds the trumpet from afar!
Soldiers of the holy war,
Rise! for you your Captain waits;
Rise! the foe is at the gates.

Arm! the conflict has begun;
Fight! the battle must be won;
Lift the banner to the sky,
Wave its blazing folds on high.

Banner of the blessed tree—
Round its glory gather ye!
Warriors of the crown and cross,
What is earthly gain or loss?

Life with death, and death with life,
Closes now with deadly strife;
Help us with thy shield and sword,
King and Captain, mighty Lord!

King of glory, Thee alone,
Kings of kings, thy name we own!
With thy banner overhead,
Not ten thousand foes we dread.

Spare not toil, nor blood nor pain;
Not a stroke descends in vain;
Wounded, still no foot we yield
On this ancient battle-field.

More than conquerors even now,
With the war-sweat on our brow,
Onward o'er the well-marked road
March we as the host of God.

Royal is the sword we wield,
Royal is our battle-field,
Royal is our victory,
Royal shall our triumph be.

Exposition of Doctrine.

MR. EDITOR: The exposition of Bible doctrines is highly proper, and also instructive, but the expositor should be content to give his views, without demanding, or, to say the least, requiring others to accept his views. In the field of investigation, especially the scientific, there is wide scope for the exercise of mind, and in this branch of human investigation we see the different orders of mind pursuing opposite paths, building into the common edifice, with materials culled from widely differing quarries, and yet aiming to complete the same building. The work, as it assumes shape, bears the impress of the workman, and is composite in its character; and, though this anomaly be apparent, nevertheless there is a place in the edifice for each separate piece of work. Hypothesis, speculation, experiment and facts may all enter into the general progress of the work, and be retained or rejected, as the builder becomes assured of their fitness or unfitness. This, in general, is the process by which we reach the end of our undertaking. Nature, including every department properly so classed, affords a vast theater for observation, for experiment and analysis, which tempts the mind to flights of vast extent; and from this wide range there is a tendency to lead astray and bewilder. This is seen in the history of scientific progress. Systems have been generated at the expense of long years of patient labor; they have had earnest disciples and zealous advocates; and yet, in the evolution of time, better light and more careful investigation have overturned the system, and buried the disciples in its ruins.

In theology the field for investigation is limited. We are not safe if, in this highest of all branches of study, we suffer speculation to mingle with and color our thoughts. Reason may test the dogma, and, if honestly used, will always submit to the teaching of the divine assertion. Take, for instance, the dogma of the witness of the Spirit. Reason, as she surveys the complex man, and takes in his wants, his weakness, his exalted genesis, and the reasonableness of some high and unmistakable evidence of his restoration to kindredship with God, from whom he has been separated by sin, at once responds to the truth of the dogma. Just here let us guard this point. We assert that there is no sound reason in the man who loves sin and hates God. He has the faculty called reason, but it is diseased, and consequently it cannot give a healthy verdict. This imperial faculty of the mind must be tuned by some divine influence before it harmonizes with divine things. It must take in the grand scheme of divine law, and bathe in divine love, until it understands the one, and is clean from pollution by contact with the other; and when thus rehabilitated it is prepared to pronounce in regard to matters of religious dogma. Were this faculty equally developed in each individual, the power of analysis and the scope of comprehension would be equal in each individual. But mind—embracing all the faculties—in each individual, though it be renewed by grace, has as many shades of strength as there are varieties of profile. Each assimilates a certain amount of divine food, and in this process there is the same diversity.

Now, if this idea be founded in truth, we at once see that to require the same experience in all persons as to the certainty of their having the witness of the Spirit would be harsh as a requirement, and not wholly sound philosophy. Let every man and woman be persuaded in themselves; and this persuasion can be reached and realized if the means provided be used. If we are ready to give good things to our children, God is more willing to give his Holy Spirit to his children, provided they ask. His word being true, and every promise urging us to seek the thing promised, what need of draping the matter under consideration with so much of human outgrowth?

Take another dogma—sanctification. We have many learned works upon this subject, but each writer differs in many things from the other. They aim at the same object, and yet their guns are not sighted alike. The words of Jesus alone are sufficient to lead us to the attainment of both these great blessings. I was once belabored for an hour with every sort of argument, and referred to over so many authors on entire sanctification, in order to my seeing this matter in the same light with my kind brother; but somehow the scales would not separate from my eyes, and I was considered in a bad case. Now this brother professed that he had the Spirit's witness, and that he enjoyed entire sanctification, and yet he deliberately violated the Sabbath. For my part, I must confess that the man who really has the witness of the Spirit and is wholly consecrated to God will, by a life in harmony therewith, offer a better argument for the dogmas than the most astute logician. INDAMORA.

Adam Was Created Holy.

MR. EDITOR: I will now prove by the Holy Scriptures that the very thing that this false theory denies is true—namely, that Adam was created holy.

1. The first argument to prove that Adam was created holy I draw from the nature of his physical and mental composition. Moses informs us that "the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life (or lives,) and man became a living soul."—Genesis ii, 7. Now it is certain that sin had not entered into the world to defile the dust of the ground before the Lord God formed the body of Adam of the dust of the ground; and therefore the dust of the ground, of which he formed the body of Adam, was holy dust of the ground. This conclusion is confirmed by Moses where he informs us that God pronounced all things that he had made "very good," which he could not have done if all things had not been created holy; for anything that God pronounces "very good" is holy. Therefore the dust of the ground, of which the body of Adam was made, was holy. As regards his bodily and spiritual lives, they were both holy, for they proceeded directly from God, for he breathed into Adam's nostrils the breath of lives, and he became a living soul; and therefore the whole composition of Adam was holy. This must be true, because the holy Lord God cannot create anything that is not holy. He created Adam, and therefore he was created holy.

2. My second argument to prove that Adam was created holy is drawn from the image and likeness in which he was made. Moses informs us that "God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness. So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him."—Genesis i, 26, 27. Now that God created Adam in his own moral image, after his own moral likeness, is certain from the fact that "God is a spirit," and has no visible corporeal image and likeness to have created him in. Well, then, if God created him in his own moral image and likeness, he must have created him holy, for the moral image and likeness of God is holiness. Any man created in God's moral image and likeness must be created holy. Adam, the first man, was created in God's own moral image and likeness, and therefore he was created holy. Again, if moral uprightness in a man is holiness, any man created morally upright must be created holy. Adam was created morally upright, and therefore he was created holy.—Ecclesiastes vii, 29. Yet again, if moral goodness, in the superlative degree, in a man is holiness, any man created "very good" must be created holy. Adam was created "very good;" therefore he was created holy.—Genesis i, 31.

3. My third argument to prove that Adam was created holy is drawn from the nature of the law under which God placed Adam after he created him. St. Paul, speaking of the nature of this law, says: "Wherefore the law is holy, and the commandment holy and just and good."—Romans vii, 12. The psalmist says of this law: "The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul; the testimony of the Lord is sure, making wise the simple; the statutes of the Lord are right, rejoicing the heart; the commandment of the Lord is pure, enlightening the eyes; the fear of the Lord is clean, enduring forever; the judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether."—Psalms xix, 7, 8, 9. This is the nature of the ever-blessed law of God under which he placed Adam after he created him. It was perfect, it was pure, it was true, it was righteous altogether, and it was holy and just and good. Now, as God placed Adam under this holy law after he created him, it is reasonable to infer that he created him holy; for if God had not created Adam holy it would have been impossible, in the very nature of the case, for him to have obeyed God's holy law. But he did for awhile obey God's holy law, and therefore he must have been created holy.

Again, if Adam had not been created so as to enable him to keep God's holy law, his holy, just and good Creator could not have punished him for transgressing it; but he did punish him for transgressing it, and therefore he must have created him holy, so as to enable him to keep it. Hence we conclude that the doctrine that denies that Adam was created holy impeaches the wisdom, justice and goodness of God. It impeaches his wisdom by supposing him to place Adam under a holy law that it was impossible for him to keep. It impeaches his justice and goodness by supposing him to punish Adam with death, temporal and spiritual, for not doing a thing that it was impossible for him to do. Now, sir, I hold that any doctrine that does this must be false.

Once more, if Adam had not been created holy, and had not fell from the holiness in which he was created, God's holy law never could have demanded the holy creation of Christ's human nature to make a sacrifice to redeem fallen Adam and his posterity. But God's holy law did require this, and therefore Adam was created holy, and fell from the holiness in which he was created. And to deny this is to deny the Bible and the whole system of the Christian religion. JAMES SHANKS.

AND the apostles said unto the Lord, Increase our faith.—Luke xvii, 5.

Jesus had just taught the disciples concerning the certain coming of offenses, the dreadful consequences to those who should commit them, and what course they must pursue toward offenders. Whether or not they fully understood all these things we do not know, but they seemed to apprehend that their duties would be exceeding great and irksome. They had also learned, it seems, another important fact: that strong and mighty faith in God was the only means whereby they might discharge their important and arduous duties toward those who should offend them. Therefore they prayed to their Lord: "Increase our faith."

They had faith. This they knew, and they acknowledged it by the character of the prayer they offered. They had faith—some degree of faith—in their Lord, and in God, his great Father. Its light and power had shined and been felt in their hearts. By it they had been enabled to surmount obstacles, performed important duties, and had passed through many trials deep and sore. But now they looked out over their future way, as the hand of the Master revealed it to them, and saw still greater duties and trials; and as they beheld they could but cry to him in whom they trusted: "Increase our faith." The disciples differed very widely sometimes in their views and feelings, but on this occasion, as the text teaches, they all entertained the same view and the same feelings. It is a remarkable circumstance that they all, unanimously, simultaneously, as with one voice, said to the Lord: "Increase our faith!"

We may not suppose that they were aware of the manner in which faith was to be increased. They may have thought, like some in our day, that the higher degrees of faith were to be infused into their souls. If so, were they not mistaken? Faith in the soul is a principle which, like a seed in the soil, is to be developed from within. God increases our faith by giving it exercise, as he did in Jacob's case, when he wrestled all night with the angel, and in the case of the woman of Canaan, who came to Jesus in behalf of her afflicted daughter.

Brethren, do you pray: "Increase our faith!" Your Master and mine will hear your prayer; and he will answer it, too, by so arranging that in his providence you shall have opportunity to exercise the little faith you have until it grows into mighty faith! Let us daily pray: "Increase our faith." W. S. T.

Physical Discoveries in the Sea.

Two important expeditions, now engaged in oceanic research, one in the Atlantic and one in the Pacific, have recently reported some of the results of their labors, which will probably put a new phase on the great problem they are seeking to elucidate. We have very lately published the full account of Commander Belknap's extensive survey of the bottom of the Pacific lying north of the great equatorial current. While his aim has been specifically to test the telegraphic accommodations of the North Pacific bed, his soundings reveal an important principle never fully, if at all, known to physical geographers. When about a hundred miles southeast of Sendai Bay, on the east coast of Japan and directly in the strong sweep of the Kuro Siwo or Japan current, the sounding indicated abyssal depths, while a little further northward, on the great route from Yokohama to Puget's Sound, the sinker carried the wire to the astounding depth of 4,643 fathoms without reaching bottom. The teeth of running water is very sharp, is an axiom of physical geography, which, in the curve of the great Gulf stream, might well have occurred to the explorer. And he rightly concludes that his experiment "confirmed the existence of a very deep trough under the Japan stream similar to that cut by the Gulf stream on our own coast." The latest reports from Captain Davis, of the Challenger expedition, present a yet more astonishing discovery. The Challenger's thermometric surveys of the Atlantic are so numerous and exact that they afford data for constructing a better map of the Atlantic sea bed than we had of North American geography at the beginning of this century. The contours of the North Atlantic present an irregular belt, shaped like the letter Z reversed, exceeding 2,500 fathoms in depth, from very near the coast of the United States and the Bahamas toward the African coast between the Canaries and Cape Verde Islands. North of this lies a submarine bank, rising to within less than 2,000 fathoms of the surface, and stretching from Greenland to the Azores. It has always been supposed that over this section poured a cold stream of arctic water on its way southward, slowly warming as it neared the equator. But the Challenger's soundings prove the startling fact that (beneath the water immediately affected by the sun's rays, believed not to extend more than 80 fathoms) all the water in the North Atlantic, as far north as the fortieth degree of latitude, is actually warmer than at the same depths under the equator itself! There being bottom water of a temperature of thirty-two degrees four minutes at the equator, with warmer water at all stations to the north of it, Captain Davis, of the Challenger, argues, with great sagacity, that it proves unmistakably that the bottom cold water of the North Atlantic comes from the antarctic region, and not from the arctic. Certainly, if at the equator the bottom water supplied from the southward retains its cold so tenaciously, the bottom water of the North Atlantic, if supplied from the nearer arctic region, should be at least as cold. But the bottom temperature increases decidedly as we go north of the line, showing that the vast submarine drift from the antarctic flows over the Atlantic floor across the equator, and penetrates our hemisphere at least as far as forty degrees north. This fact apparently upsets nearly all the prevailing theories, if not every theory that has ever been current, and demonstrates that the circulation of the sea is not carried on between the polar and equatorial basins, but between the Antarctic ocean and the North Atlantic on the one hand, and probably between the Antarctic and North Pacific on the other.—New York Herald.

THE WIND.

BY EMMA K. BAILEY.

The wind arose;
In fitful gusts it swept the fallen leaves;
Its voice was full of anger,
Like the smothered growl
Of some wild beast of prey it came,
Gathering strength and gathering force,
Wildly rushing its fearful course.
With bellowings, howls, aye, frightful shrieks,
It bounds upon the forest oak,
And rends it limb from limb.

Onward sweeps the raging power unbound;
It groans and writhes for very madness;
Then, combining all its scattering notes
For the last fell swoop of destruction,
It bursts, like the deafening roar
Of the great cathedral organ,
Upon the listening ear, and fills
The human soul with terrific awe;
Then, dying away like the wail of lost souls,
Sends a shudder through every nerve.

Ah! gentle wind, fanning my fevered brow
With delicate freshness, whence comest thou?
Can it be that the listless quiver of the leaves
And thy cool breath upon my cheek
Are but the after sprinklings
Of the storm king's vengeful wrath?

Spiritualism.

My own observations of spiritualism have convinced me of three things: First, that its phenomena are invariably associated with mental and nervous perversion, and generally with morbid impulses of the type that accompanies epilepsy; secondly, that mediums are, as a rule, persons of defective physical organization; thirdly, that the seances rapidly exhaust the nervous energy of the operator. I have notes of one instance in which the medium died of exhaustion consequent upon his most celebrated feat. Again, as far as I have observed at seances given by trance-mediums, those prodomata of the epileptic attack, sudden cadaverous pallor and a kind of fading of the eye, accompanied with dilation of the pupil, invariably precede and announce the supervention of the trance; and another fact conclusively established is that, although the trance supervenes at the will of the medium, it must always be preceded by a stage of incubation more or less prolonged, during which nervous hebetude is distinctly present, and the intellectual faculties are torpid. Miss Fox has been known to fall fainting on a sofa in the midst of a seance, and Mr. Home's health is broken at scarcely forty.

These observations have now covered cases enough to permit the affirmation that clairvoyance and its peripheral nerve-atmosphere are determinately the results of the reflex excitability incident to epilepsy; and I know from actual observation that epileptic convulsions may be replaced by artificially induced clairvoyance, at least in some instances. I have also personally observed that epileptics, pending the stage of incubation, always appear to be enveloped in a highly excited and sensitive nerve-atmosphere, which, sometimes accompanied with sullenness, sometimes with sensory exaltation, is one of the precursors of the attack. Indeed this excited aura, often of considerable periphery, is, so far as my studies have extended, invariably indicative that a nervous crisis is at hand; and on comparing notes with physicians, I find that medical men have noticed the same phenomenon, not only as incident to epilepsy, but as the exponent of the stage of incubation in periodical mania generally. Scribner's.

Combats on the Ocean.

Among the extraordinary spectacles sometimes witnessed by those "who go down to the sea in ships," none are more impressive than a combat for the supremacy between the monsters of the deep. The battles of the sword-fish and the whale are described as Homeric in grandeur. The sword-fish go in schools like whales, and the attacks are regular sea fights. When the two troops meet, as soon as the sword-fish have betrayed their presence by a few bounds in the air, the whales draw together and close up their ranks. The sword-fish always endeavors to take the whale in the flank, either because its cruel instinct has revealed to it the defect in the carcass—for there exists near the brachial fins of the whale a spot where wounds are mortal—or because the flank presents a wider surface to its blow. The sword-fish recoils to secure a greater impetus. If the movement escape the keen eye of his adversary, the whale is lost, for it receives the blow of the enemy, and dies almost instantly. But if the whale perceives the sword-fish at the instant of the rush, by a spontaneous bound it springs clear of the water its entire length, and falls on its flank with a crash that resounds for many leagues, and whitens the sea with boiling foam. The gigantic animal has only its tail for the defense. It tries to strike its enemy and finishes him at a single blow. But if the active sword-fish avoid the fatal tail, the battle becomes more terrible. The aggressor springs from the water in his turn, falls upon the whale, and attempts not to pierce, but to saw it with the teeth that garnish its weapon. The sea is stained with blood; the fury of the whale is boundless. The sword-fish harasses him, strikes him on every side, kills him and flies to other victories. Often the sword-fish has not time to avoid the fall of the whale, and contents itself with presenting its sharp saw to the flank of the gigantic animal which is about to crush it. It then dies like Macedaeus, smothered beneath the weight of the elephant of the ocean. Finally the whale gives a few last bounds into the air, dragging its assassin in its flight, and perishes as it kills the monster of which it was the victim.

THERE'S no music in a "rest," Katie, that I know of, but there's the making of music in it. And people are always missing that part of the life-melody, and scrambling on without counting; not that it's easy to count, but nothing on which so much depends ever is easy. People are always talking of perseverance and courage and fortitude; but patience is the finest and worthiest part of fortitude, and the rarest too. I have known twenty persevering girls to one patient one, but it is only the twenty-first one who can do her work, out and out, and enjoy it; for patience lies at the root of all pleasures as well as of all powers.—Ruskin.

Obituaries.

DIED, near Amite City, Louisiana, on the thirty-first of January, 1875, after a few hours' painful life, MONROE, only child of Henry and Mary Parham. No suffering can touch him now. H.

DIED, February 13, 1875, MARIA LOUISE, daughter of S. W. and Fannie E. Swayze, aged five years and three months.

It is a painful duty to record the death of this lovely and gifted child. No words from any one can add to her merits, yet we deem it a duty to give some expression of respect and affection for one so beautiful, gentle and sprightly. That death loves a shining mark was never more truly illustrated than in the death of Louise; and although she had culled the flowers of but few springs, her intellectual faculties seemed at times to have ripened into full maturity.

Bright and beautiful, her untimely death has caused many friends to put on the habiliments of mourning. The brightest link that bound the household is broken, never to be united on earth; but her gentle spirit will hover over a doting mother, and beckon her on to fields of eternal bliss. W. P. K.

DIED, at the family residence in DeSoto parish, Louisiana, on Wednesday evening, January 20, 1875, of inflammatory rheumatism, VICTORIA ELLISS, wife of Frank Alleu, aged thirty-six years.

She was born and brought up in the Catholic faith. She was a zealous Christian. It was obvious to those who knew her intimately that she walked by faith and in the Spirit. Kind, gentle and patient, here was a ministering spirit. In all of my acquaintance with our departed sister I never heard her speak an unkind word or make an uncharitable remark of any one. Charity was her "crowning virtue." Victoria had been in failing health for several years. Intelligent, industrious, economical, promoting her husband's interests and ministering to the wants of a large family, she no doubt overrated her strength, and perhaps hastened her death. And yet she is not dead. "That higher, better life beyond the tomb, beyond the cold and darkly rolling wave, is hers." Can a mother's prayers or her influence ever be wholly eradicated? Though her offspring be too young to appreciate the value of a mother, or receive personal benefit by her example, he who hath said, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee," answers those prayers in his own good time and way. What an incentive to pray! The last words of that dying mother to her eldest child, a little boy of seven years, were: "Touch not, taste not, handle not." Precious legacy!

Dear sister, farewell. That the God you loved and served may shield and guide thy darling babes, and that the inspiration of the Holy Spirit may direct them to seek the Savior early, and so prepare them to meet thee where thou art now being initiated into the beauties of the celestial city, is the daily prayer of their sympathizing aunt.

DR. JOHN O. SMITH was born in Virginia about eighty years ago, and died in Pensacola, Florida, December 10, 1874.

For forty years he was a faithful and efficient member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and was many years a steward. By economy, industry and good business qualifications he acquired considerable property, and for years dispensed a noble and generous hospitality. His house was the preacher's home, where he always received from Dr. Smith and wife sympathy, attention, and necessary aid and advice. The Methodist church in Pensacola is very greatly indebted to Dr. Smith, for when weak and persecuted, and well-nigh ready to give up, he stood by with firmness, and encouraged and aided with money and counsel, and kept up the organization. I think it true that, while the church there has had many noble and useful members who did their whole duty, no one was so long a member, and no one did so much for the support of the ministers and the current expenses of the church.

Dr. Smith was a constant reader of our church periodicals and literature, and was well posted in and a great lover of Methodist doctrines and usages. He was quiet and unostentatious, very conscientious and faithful in the discharge of duty. War and misfortune swept away most of his property, and I think it sometimes pained him that in his last days he was not able to do as much for his church as he had done in the days of his temporal prosperity. He was twice married, and by his first wife had one child, who died several years ago. His second wife survives him. He was sick for three years before his departure, and his spirit seemed to become more and more refined until it took its flight. He was patient, uncomplaining, and longed to depart and be with Christ. For a long period there was no cloud over his sky.

ELLA JOSEPHINE, second daughter of Thomas L. and H. E. Holliday, died, at the residence of her aunt, Mrs. Mary Murdock, in Yazoo City, Mississippi, February 18, 1875, aged fifteen years and eighteen days.

Her disease—congestion of the brain—was sudden and rapid in its progress, terminating in death in less than three short days. She was attending school in Yazoo City. Her parents were dispatched for, but arrived only a few hours before they were to bid their darling daughter farewell until they shall meet on the shores of that "beautiful river that flows by the throne of God."

Josie was an example worthy the highest admiration. As a student she was remarkable for her obedience, diligence and quickness of perception. Often receiving the approbation of her teachers, she was designated as one of the "good girls" of the school. Kind and affectionate in her disposition, she won the love and admiration of all who knew her, and was a general favorite among her associates. "None knew her but to love her." Her kind words and cheerful manners made her alike the friend and comforter of all her schoolmates.

As an obedient and loving daughter she sought only the pleasure of her parents, cheerfully assisting her mother in all her duties, and anxiously partaking of her father's cares. Around the family circle, among her brothers and sisters, she was as a ray of sunshine, always cheering and gladdening them in their various duties. How true, O how true does it seem that "death loves a shining mark!"

Though our Josie made no profession of religion, yet we have the assurance and fond hope that she rests in the bosom of our Master. Brought up in the "nurture and admonition of the Lord," the ball-room and the dance, which so often entice and draw off the young heart, had no charms for her. She never forgot her duties; and when she had finished her labors for the day it was her constant habit to kneel in thankful prayer to him who had watched over and kept her during the day. Her thoughts of God and religion were exalted for a child. In her little note-book, which she kept with care, are written the following quotations: "Flowers were made by one who tells us we cannot make any." Again, from First Corinthians xiii, 1: "Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal."

Only a few days before her illness she remarked to her cousin that she was not afraid to die; and when asked why she spoke thus she replied: "I know of no sins that I have committed that my Savior will not forgive." "O death! where is thy sting? O grave! where is thy victory?" Let us look beyond the Jordan, and strive to meet our sister there.

MISS ELIZA JANE TUCKER, eldest daughter of Reuben and Sarah Tucker, was born in Barbour county, Alabama, July 22, 1853, and died at her paternal home, near Woodville, Louisiana, January 1, 1875.

She became a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1870, holding her membership at Wesley chapel, Vernon circuit. Last September, while attending the Vernon camp meeting, she professed religion. Just after this my acquaintance with her began. As I was boarding in the family I knew her most intimately in her different relations of daughter, stepdaughter, sister and friend, and without giving her any undue merit, without fear of passing judgment unsustained by conscientious approval, I love to think of her as one of the very best girls with whom I was ever associated. Pure, gentle and trusting, but energetic, determined and persevering, she was ever ready with hand and heart to comfort or assist. About the first of December she was attacked with typhoid fever in one of its most virulent phases. Her physician's skillful attention had brought her almost to the confines of convalescence. She began again to manifest an interest in the minutiæ of the home circle, her naturally cheerful, joyous temperament asserting itself variously, with gentleness and affection. On Christmas day she had every indication of speedy and positive recovery, but by the twenty-eighth she had grown alarmingly worse. Much of the time, after this relapse, her mind was oscillating between sanity and delirium. At times she was entirely natural, and would converse with promptness and intelligence. On the evening of the thirty-first her father asked: "Eliza, do you know you must die?" She replied: "I knew it." He then inquired: "Where will you go?" She promptly replied: "To heaven;" and then advised her sisters at the bedside, "Never give it up," remarking, "I am so happy," and requested them to sing. On New Year morning she was sinking rapidly, but began to sing: "O how I love Jesus." Later in the day, not long before she expired, as she gazed steadily into that unspoken "beyond," her eyes beaming with preternatural brightness, she exclaimed: "Higher, higher;" and then, as if meeting some one in her vision world, her face all aglow with rapturous smiles, she uttered with much emphasis: "How do you do? How do you do? How do you do?" If guardian angels ever rove about the couch of the dying, she was then doubtless meeting spirit to spirit with the dear mother who years and years ago winged her way triumphantly from earth to glory. The last fifteen minutes she spent in a continuous exercise of voice, but her articulation was so indistinct that we could comprehend nothing, although her voice was sufficiently loud and strong to be heard in the adjoining room. When the struggle was over, a countenance more lovely, placid and peaceful could not be imagined. No brighter tribute can be dedicated to the memory of woman than that she died in the faith, and has gone to stand "before the throne of God, and serve him day and night in his temple." "She shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more; neither shall the sun light on her, nor any heat." Well might the mortal form assume a face and expression beautiful in death when the glories of an eternal world were glistening and brightening above it. Her family must miss her; but, though

"The severed tie
Is broken, yet why grieve? For those but holds
His society in trust till joy shall heal
To the blest world where parting is unknown."

LAURA A. COLBERT.

THE Jews, in a legend that is not meaningless, tell us that the great Law-giver on the mount needed no human sustenance, because the subtle harmonies of the universe so filled his soul as to sustain his whole being with their heavenly diapason; but when he came down out of the rolling clouds the vesture of decay closed his ears, and he hungered for earthly food.

THE solemn mystery of life and death is one of the mightiest problems the human mind has ever had to contemplate.—Duff Porter.

TRUST.

In lightning's flash, in thunder's roll,
When storms sweep o'er the troubled soul,
O Christ, our Savior, onto thee
For hope and refuge may we flee.

Thou who dost guide each autumn leaf,
Dost pity us in every grief,
Thou who for fallen man didst die,
To succor us art ever nigh.

And with a father's gentle care
Wilt all our heavy burden bear,
That feet, which now so weary roam,
May reach the soul's eternal home.

Then, though the darkest tempest lowers,
May we but call this refuge ours;
With calm, unshaken faith and love,
We'll see the sunlight far above.

O God of majesty and might!
Guard us and guide in death's dark night,
And when the cold mist dims our eyes
Take us to homes beyond the skies.

Ten Minutes for Jesus.

The following is an abstract of Dr. Bottome's address at the anniversary of the Fulton street daily prayer meeting, New York, September 23, 1874:

I am reminded by the circular that I have only ten minutes in which to speak on this remarkable occasion. I am instructed: "What thou doest do quickly." Well, I have ten minutes for Jesus. It took less time than that for Judas to betray his Master, and for Peter to deny his Lord. It took less than ten minutes for Jesus to preach his great sermon on regeneration to his single auditor by night; less than ten minutes for the poor woman to elbow her way through the pressing crowd to touch the hem of the Savior's garment, and bring healing virtue out of him to her poor diseased body and soul; less than ten minutes for the Canaanitish mother to turn the points of the Savior's arguments against her into most conclusive appeals in her own behalf, and to drive the demons from her home and child, by the exhibition of a faith which put all Israel to the blush, and drew forth that wondering exclamation of the Savior, which has gilded her name as foremost in the annals of conquering faith; less than ten minutes for Bartimeus to spring to his feet, as he heard the heavy tramp of the approaching crowd, and cry: "Jesus, thou Son of David, have mercy on me!" and to receive the direct response to the ready prayer: "Lord, that I may receive my sight!" "Receive thy sight!" and to leap into the light of day; less than ten minutes for the Master to drive out the legion of devils from the poor demoniac into a herd of swine, and down into the engulfing waters of the sea below; less than ten minutes for the penitent thief to feel and acknowledge the justness of his sentence, and to turn his dying head toward the bosom of his dying Lord, and in answer to his contrite prayer receive the blessed assurance of instant paradise.

It took less than ten minutes to smite the red-handed Saul of Tarsus with the blinding rays of the most excellent glory, and to change the malice-spurred murderer into an humble suppliant at the feet of Jesus of Nazareth, whom he persecuted; less than ten minutes for Paul and Silas to quiet the fears of the alarmed jailer, and lead him to such a faith in Jesus as sent him instantly, leaping and praising God, to his family and home, telling what great things God had done for him.

It is not length of time, but earnestness of purpose, that insures success. And it is remarkable how the prayers of the Bible seem modeled after this idea. Many of the most effective prayers of Bible record are put into single sentences. The Lord's Prayer—that model prayer—what precise elocutionist could possibly pull that into a length of two minutes? Look at the prayer of the publican: "God be merciful to me, a sinner!" Could anything be more comprehensive? And it has this divine commendation: that he who breathed it "went down to his house justified." The psalmist's prayer of five words: "I am thine; save me!" how compact and how simple! Could more meaning be put into it if twenty times multiplied?

"Cut off your prayers at both ends," is a frequent injunction of one of our own great leaders in prayer. Indeed it is remarkable how much is gained by this method of directness and condensation. Business men understand this. They know the difference between the customer who comes before them with no special end, and one who comes directly to the point.

"I have just ten minutes," said a business man, as he walked leisurely to the desk of the salesman, in one of our large houses, the other day, taking his watch in his hand; "please take my order." "Certainly, sir," was the prompt reply of the clerk, and in less than five minutes the order was entered, covering an invoice of many thousands of dollars, and plenty of time was left for pleasant courtesies. When you know what you want it does not take long to ask for it. It is only when we have so little to say that it takes so long to say it. If you want a thing badly you will be likely to ask for it very directly and very earnestly. It is just so with all work for Jesus. When you are really impressed with a mission, and are straitened to its accomplishment, you will set about it in the very readiest manner.

While stationed in a certain city, some years ago, the celebrated Mr. Moody came into the city late one Saturday evening. He immediately found the house of a deacon of one of the churches, and at once introduced himself as Mr. Moody, of Chicago, saying that he would have to stay over Sabbath in the city, and wanted to hold a prayer meeting in the morning, in one of the churches, at eight o'clock. "But how will you get the people?" was the astonished response. "Can I have the church?" he replied. "Yes, I suppose you can." "Very well, it is now (looking at his watch) fifteen minutes to nine o'clock. Come with me, and we will go into Main street, and you go on one side of the street and I will go on the other, and advertise the meeting in every store." It was done, and sharp on the mark, next morning, there gathered such a company as had seldom collected at so early an hour for prayers in that place, and in a few hours the whole city was in a revival flame.

Said a devoted lady, at the close of one of our camp meeting services, to a poor trembling sinner, as he stood outside the circle of prayer: "Are you ready to give yourself to the Lord Jesus?" "I haven't time," said he; "my train leaves in fifteen minutes." "But," said she, "it will take you less time than that to die, and it need not take you so long to believe on Christ. Get down on your knees where you are, and call upon God for mercy." The poor man did so, and in five minutes' time he was on his way to the train, praising and shouting aloud the salvation of God.

A poor soldier in one of the Washington hospitals was visited by a minister, who saw that life was ebbing fast. "Young man," said he, "you are soon to die; are you saved?" "No, sir," was the earnest reply; "what shall I do?" "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." "Say that again," demanded the soldier. It was repeated. Steadily and earnestly looking at the minister, the young man rejoined: "Is that all?" "Yes, that's all. I can say nothing more; there is nothing more." Closing his eyes for a few moments, the youth at length opened them again, and raising his right hand, palm upward, as if taking the oath of allegiance, he exclaimed: "Lord Jesus, I surrender!" Instantly his face shone as if it had been the face of an angel. And in a few days the new-born soul went home to God.

Ten minutes' work for Jesus! Ten minutes with God in prayer! O who can estimate the results! Ten minutes with an earthly potentate, and it is the pride and remembrance of a lifetime. But ten minutes with God! Ten minutes at the throne of grace! Ten minutes in fellowship with Jesus, and in communion with his saints! A privilege unspeakable! O grace unmerited, but free! "For where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst."

And the history of this noon-day prayer meeting is just this: precious brevities, gathered fragments, wise use of spare moments at midday, by business men, on the most important business of life—intercourse with God.

Missions and Zenana Work in India.

A correspondent of the London Times is giving very interesting accounts of the missions in India. He speaks well of them, and manifests a genuine appreciation of the value of real missionary work.

He speaks as follows of the American missionary work:

"A curious feature of the educational life of India is the American mission work. The Americans have two newspapers—the Bombay Guardian and the Lucknow Witness—giving to saying hard things of unbelievers, it is true, but edited, I believe, by self-denying men (the case of the Bombay Guardian is almost that of an ascetic,) and devoted to the purposes for which the men were sent there. Among other great efforts the Americans have established what they call an American Mission Home, where there are about a dozen or fourteen young ladies, both Europeans and natives, who go out daily to zenanas (Hindoo houses) and schools to teach. Their whole day is occupied, and the only fee charged is two shillings a month per head, but the mission has a government grant of the same amount. One of the ladies in Calcutta—Miss Seelye—is a physician, and has established near to the 'home' a hospital for children, which is doing immense good. She also practices among the native ladies, charging somewhere about eight shillings a visit when it is right to charge, and giving her labor gratuitously where it is not; but all her fees the good lady carries to the general account of the society—far, I believe, beyond what she receives as salary. The ladies also have in charge a foundling hospital, established by the municipality of Calcutta. The mission is altogether unsectarian, and not in any way akin to the American missions at Bombay, Oude and Rohilcund, which are denominational. There must be unpleasant work at times to do. A young lady who was recently assisting temporarily in the home told me that one day the husband of a native lady she was teaching peremptorily ordered her away, and never to come there again, but the pupil whispered: 'Never mind him; he is merely saying this because his brother is here and listening.' The female advice was taken in preference to the male order, and the visits continue as before. The lady who had this triumph is both pretty and intelligent. 'Her eyes, above all, are beautiful—bright and liquid almost beyond description;' but she cannot be seen by any one of the other sex, not even by her husband's brother or father. She chafes under the hardship, and told her visitor one day, with naive simplicity, that 'this sort of life was like that of frogs in a well—all around life and beauty, and she buried.'

"The teaching-time ranges from an hour to an hour and a half in each case, and these good lady teachers go from one house to another from eleven in the morning to about half-past four or five in the afternoon. Then they also teach the children in zenanas—married ladies, it will be remembered, at five years of age, and in many painful instances widows. Some of your readers may know what an awful lot is that of an Indian widow who may become so in early infancy. She cannot marry again without disgrace; she can only eat one meal a day, and that of the coarsest rice, and her dress must be without ornament. An iron ring worn on the left wrist is taken away, and a red mark, which is put on day by day, at the parting of the hair, to denote married life, must be put there no more forever. The woman or child is considered dead when her husband dies. Happily there is a great revolt against this fearful and unnatural system, and some of the widows are finding employment as teachers and otherwise in zenana schools. They are not, of course, allowed to go out of the house, and the Brahmoes are doing excellent work by promoting widow marriage, and giving it effect wherever their influence extends. It is difficult, if not impossible, to represent work of this kind by figures of arithmetic. Beyond all question, the stable fabric of Hindooism is being gradually disintegrated, but with this certain and appalling disadvantage that, in spite of all work and sacrifice, in losing one faith the people do not seem generally to find another. The position in most cases is one of pure negation. Let me not be understood as rating too humbly native Christianity. I have within the last few days seen instances of a most remarkable kind of its great earnestness and devotion, coupled in some cases with rare and beautiful modesty.

"Not far from where I am writing about two hundred such men, of all 'evangelical' denominations—I use the word evangelical in its conventional sense—will meet for a united prayer meeting on Tuesday next, the fourth meeting of a series begun under a late impulse of revivals. I met the other day, in the course of my inquiries, with a grave, thoughtful native of about fifty years of age, who has a large congregation in the Sunderbunds, where he rules, I am told, wisely and well, and seldom sees an European face. So far as preaching is concerned, I should say the Methodists are most successful. A temporary chapel of theirs, not very far from government house, is crowded. Upon the whole, they eschew educational work, and direct their efforts into the one given channel of preaching; while the Roman Catholics, with the skill proverbial of them, take every available means by all agencies of bringing men into their church. Yet the vastness of the work is beyond conception. Paine's Age of Reason is at present largely placarded on all the walls of Calcutta, and I should say has a very large circulation at one shilling a copy, and his arguments are just the kind to be appreciated. The work has been circulated in India for years, but this is a new effort. In fact, whatever may be the cause, Christianity cannot be said to be progressing in India in a ratio at all to be compared with the efforts made by its advocates. Still, that a wonderful work is going on, and real progress being made, slow though it may be, was clearly shown at the conference to which I have referred. A native community is growing up in a knowledge of Christianity. I mean there is that important fact—a second generation rising up with nothing to unlearn. There is scarcely a nook or corner of India where portions of the Bible are not being read in the native languages. At the same time, every day's experience shows the wisdom of the policy which, in spite of all missionary expostulation, has steadily refused to make the State schools in any sense religious.

"I think I ought to say also that in the course of much intercourse with native gentlemen I scarcely ever met with any bitter antagonism to Christianity. They do not wish to become Christians. They say, at times, that Christianity is a very good religion, but that for their part they are content to do as their fathers did in generations gone."

Sun Birds.

The humming bird family is a very large one, and contains all manner of brilliant little creatures, with names such as the topaz, and the amethyst, and the ruby-throated humming bird. And sometimes the tiny gem is adorned with an elegant ruff on its neck, that it can set up and down at pleasure, and then it is called a "coquette."

The life of the humming bird is spent among the brightest scenes of nature. He flashes from flower to flower with the rapidity of lightning, and hovers over first one and then another. His food consists of the tiny insects that live amid the petals, and nature has provided him with a long and slender bill on purpose to pick them out.

Sometimes the bill is straight, and sometimes it is curved. In some species it curves upward, and the bird is called the avocet humming bird; in others it is bent like a sickle.

The tongue is slender, and can be put out to a great length. It is made up of two parts, like round tubes, that are laid side by side for nearly their whole length, and then are separate. It is very sticky, and when it is thrust into the flower the insects stick to it and cannot get away. And the edge of the tongue is fringed with tiny bristles, that still further help to entrap them.

The sun bird is a near relative of the humming bird, and wears the same gorgeous attire. He has been called the humming bird of Africa, because that part of the world is his home, and there a vast number of sun birds are found.

The family name of Nectariniidæ has been given because the bird sips the nectar of the flowers, and was once supposed to live entirely on honey. But it is now well known that the sun bird feeds very much on insects, and only gives zest to his banquets by a sip of the juices of the flowers.

The name of sun bird is very appropriate, since the sunlight has a remarkable effect on his plumage, and makes it look like gold and precious stones. This effect is really produced by the bird, as he moves his muscles and changes the position of his feathers, throwing them every moment into a different light.

ENJOY life, and be not melancholy and wish thyself in heaven. If a king should give you the keeping of a castle and grounds, and you use them, promising in twenty years' time to make you a privy counselor, do not neglect the castle, refuse the fruits, and sit down, whine and wish yourself a privy counselor.—John Selden.

Regular Eating.

Half of all ordinary diseases would be banished from civilized life, and dyspepsia become almost unknown, if everybody would eat but thrice a day at regular times, and not an atom between meals, the interval not being less than five hours, that being the time required to digest a full meal and pass it out of the stomach.

If a person eats between meals the process of digestion of the food already in the stomach is arrested until the last which has been eaten is brought into the condition of the former meal, just as if water is boiling and ice put in, the whole ceases to boil until the ice is melted and brought to the boiling-point, and then the whole boils together.

But it is the law of nature that all food begins to decay, to rot, after exposure to heat and moisture for a certain time. If a meal is eaten, and in two hours another, the whole remains undigested for several hours, before which time the rottening process commences, and the man has his stomach full of carion—the very idea of which is horribly disgusting; but that such is the case the unendurable odor of the belching demonstrates.

As, then, all the food in the stomach is in a rotten condition, in a state of fermentive decay, it becomes unfit for the purposes of nutrition and making pure blood in the whole body; hence the nerves, which feed on this impure and imperfect blood, are not properly nourished, and as a consequence become diseased. "They complain" they are hungry—and like a hungry man are peevish, fretful, restless. We call it nervousness, and no one ever knew a dyspeptic who was not restless, fidgety, fretful, and essentially disagreeable and uncertain.

The stomach is made up of a number of muscles, all of which are brought into requisition in the process of digestion. But no muscle can work always. The busy heart is in a state of perfect repose one-third of its time. The eye can wink twice in a second, but this could not be continued five minutes. The hands and feet must have rest, and so with the muscles of the stomach; they can only rest when there is no work for them to do—no food in the stomach to digest. Even at five hours' interval, and eating twice a day, they are kept constantly at work from breakfast until the last meal is disposed of, usually ten o'clock at night. But multitudes eat heartily till within an hour of bed-time. Thus, while the other portions of the body are at rest, the stomach is kept laboring until almost daylight, and made to begin again at breakfast-time. No wonder is it that the stomach is worn out—has lost its power of action. Many girls become dyspeptic before they are out of their teens in consequence of their being about the house and nibbling at everything they lay their eyes on that is good to eat.—Hall's Journal.

THE EXCAVATIONS AT POMPEII.—The diggings at Pompeii, says the Pall Mall Gazette, are just now going on with vigor. What has been brought to light in the course of so many years is really, after all, only a small part of the city, and every search below the ground adds something to the stock. It is certainly startling, as the spade and basket are busily at work, to come suddenly on a large painting of Orpheus with the beasts listening to his music, freshbrought to light after his lucky imprisonment of eighteen hundred years. The charm is perhaps a little broken when we find that the columns of the newly discovered houses are, like those of so many of the houses of Pompeii, no real columns at all, but masses of brick covered with plaster. But the picture is certainly one of the most striking among the mural paintings in the buried city. It is to be hoped that nothing will induce those who have the management of these works ever to fall back on the old, bad way of carrying everything off to the museum at Naples. A painting or anything else loses more than half its value if it is carried off from the place for which it is meant. In a museum it is simply a specimen; in its own place it is part of a whole. For objects which, for any cause, cannot be left on the spots where they are found the museum which is forming in Pompeii itself, not that at Naples, is clearly the right place. For the rest, the simple course is that which is now followed: that of roofing in the buildings where perishable objects, like paintings, are found. Leda showing her children to Tyndareus is worth ten times more in her own place, on the wall where she was first painted, than if she had been carried off to keep company with Briseis and Iphigenia among a crowd of other objects which were never meant to be seen altogether.

A WONDERFUL FLOWER.—One of the most exquisite wonders of the sea is the opelet, a flower resembling very much the German China aster. It has the appearance of a double aster, with a quantity of petals of a light green color, glossy as silk, each petal tipped with rose-color. These lovely petals are never still, but wave about in the water, while the flower clings to the rock. So innocent and lovely-looking, no one could suspect it of eating anything; certainly if it did, only a bit of rainbow or a drop of dew. But those beautiful waving petals have other and more material work to do—to provide food for a large mouth, which is cunningly hid deep down among them. They do their duty famously; for as soon as a silly little fish comes in contact with those rosy tips he is struck with a poison fatal and quick as lightning. He dies instantly, and the beautiful arms wrap themselves about him and drag him into the greedy mouth. Then those lovely petals unclose and float innocently on the water, just like our water lily. This flower was long ago talked of, but its existence doubted until the last century. Now the opelet is known to be a thing that really exists.

MARRIAGES are best of dissimilar material.—Theodore Parker.

Religious Intelligence.

ARCHBISHOP MANNING is said to be endeavoring to abolish all music in his churches except the pure Gregorian chants.

REV. DR. THOMAS A. JAGGER, of Philadelphia, has been chosen Bishop of the new diocese of Ohio. He is a Low Churchman.

THE Pope has decreed that the apostolic treasury shall spend one hundred and eighty thousand lire more for the publication of Catholic papers in 1875 than in 1874.

A LETTER from a missionary in India says the tyrant who rules the zenanas in that country is the mother-in-law, and she often proves to be a stone wall against the gospel efforts of Christian visitors.

THE police court at Treves has decided, with regard to the imprisonment of the Bishop of Treves, that one day in prison is to be counted for five thalers' fine—that is, the prelate's time is worth five thalers a day.

THE Austrian bishops were in recent assembly at Prague, in order to discuss the differences between Church and State. The Vienna papers assert that they are willing to submit to the government in every point.

THE last General Assembly appropriated $400,000 to the Board of Home Missions during the year. Up to January 1 only $134,294.53 have been received, leaving $265,705.47 to be received during the remaining four months of the year.

THE Vicar General De Lorenzi, of Treves, some time since sentenced to a fine of two hundred thalers for appointing a pastor contrary to the State laws, was discharged by the Court of Appeals; but the Ober tribunal at Berlin confirmed the first sentence.

THE Turkish Missions Aid Society of London has just voted £1,000 to the Aintab College in Syria, making $20,750 raised for the object in England. As the institution is one of the enterprises of the American Board, this generous contribution from friends on the other side can hardly be supplemented by any less sum by friends on this. The college is such an obvious necessity for central Turkey that we have no doubt that the supporters of the board will sooner or later insure its complete success.

AN EXCHANGE SAYS: "The following figures show the number of missionaries supported in India by the principal Presbyterian churches in 1871: American Presbyterian, 32; Scotch Free Church, 19; Scotch United Presbyterian, 9; Irish Presbyterian, 8; American Reformed, 6; Welch Calvinistic Methodist, 5; Scotch Established Church, 4; American United Presbyterian, 3; United States German Evangelical, 2. The English Presbyterians also contribute toward the spread of the gospel in India."

SAD news comes from the Karen missions around Toungu, Burmah. Vast armies of rats have swept the fields of the standing grain. The government has only recently begun to assist the people, when their migration from the jungles into the plain forced the matter upon the attention of the officials. The whole northern country of the Karens is on the move for food. Many perish on the way, unable to reach Toungu, where relief works have been established. Schools and churches have been broken up by the famine.

THE meetings for holiness just held by Messrs. Inskip and McDonald in Hamilton, Ontario county, Canada, in the Centenary Methodist church, were a grand success. The city was very greatly moved. On the Sabbath, in the morning, Bro. Inskip preached a powerful sermon to a large congregation. In the afternoon was held a social meeting, and there were not less than 200 seekers at the altar, and some 50 converted. McDonald preached in the evening to more than 2,000 persons, and some 150 seekers were at the altar. It was a great day. The Lord is working wonderfully.—Zion's Herald.

THE English "Church Directory" gives some interesting details concerning the Roman Catholic community in Great Britain. Dividing England and Wales into thirteen "dioceses" and Scotland into three "districts" (the faithful in those parts being still under "vicars apostolic,") it shows that there are now in the former no less than 1,728 priests, serving 1,041 churches, chapels and missionary stations; and in the latter 238 more clergy, serving 227 such chapels. Both these calculations, it is to be observed, include such clergy as are invalided or retired, but exclude such private and domestic chapels as are not open to the Catholics of their respective neighborhoods. There are in Great Britain no less than 21 archbishops and bishops—one archbishop and two bishops being retired, while two others are bishops "auxiliary."

HITCHCOCK HALL, otherwise the new Library building of the Congregational House, Boston, just dedicated, will be the principal depository of Congregational history in this country. Twenty thousand bound volumes and many more thousand pamphlets, which have been accumulating for years, will be transferred from their old nooks to the new shelves, and fortunately find there a safe spot, as the hall has been built to resist fire from within and without. The building was the gift of the late Samuel Hitchcock, of Brimfield, and its dedication was made the occasion of a considerable gathering of Congregational ministers and laymen. Hon. E. S. Tobey presided; Deacon Ezra Farnsworth, of the building committee, presented the keys to Dr. Dexter, of the library committee, and several pleasant speeches were made and a few rare books presented. No doubt some day Hitchcock Hall will contain archives of Puritan, Pilgrim and Congregational history which will make it the center for future students and writers in this department. To the denomination the new building is a grand gift, and with the Congregational library in it will be a most valuable possession.

DR. ELLINWOOD, of the Presbyterian Board, makes the following statement concerning the missions in Japan: "No general proclamation of religious liberty has been made. None will be made. The government will not commit itself by any step of which wily Jesuitism can take advantage, nor deprive itself of the power to repress that pestilent scourge of the nations wherever it shall be necessary. But the quiet, peaceable work of Protestant missions will not be disturbed. Of this I am assured not only by the Protestant missionaries, but by those whose official position gives them opportunities of learning directly the policy of the government in this respect. No other people seem so teachable, so indifferent to their existing systems of error, so flexible in character and so anxious for progress as the Japanese. One of the calmest and soundest of our veteran missionaries—one who has witnessed all the wonderful changes since the first beginning of mission labor at Yokohama—expressed to me the belief that in twenty-five years Japan would be Christian."

AS EARLY as 1817 the London Society commenced to labor among the Mongolians. The mission was located in the Buriat tribe, living under Russian authority, and was broken up by the Emperor Nicholas in 1841. Five years ago the work was resumed and Peking made the basis of the missionaries' operations. The sparseness of the Mongolian population is a great discouragement to the evangelists among these Buddhist nomads. Taking an average of his four trips in 1873, from Kalgar, on the Chinese frontier, Mr. Gilmour, the missionary, found that he had traveled twelve miles a day, by camel, to speak with twenty persons—men, women and children. Medicine is the only form of Christianity for which these Mongols have yet expressed a desire. Meantime Mongolia as a separate country is being blotted out. Chinese emigrants, passing the Great Wall, have settled in it in large numbers, changing its grassy plains into cultivated fields, studded with houses. The Russians also are coming down from the north, Russianizing and at the same time Christianizing the Mongols as they advance.—Independent.

THE London Methodist says: "The system of collecting juvenile offerings was begun in 1841, when the enthusiasm of the Methodist centenary had not yet passed away. It was well started under the presidencies of Drs. Newton and Dixon, and realized that year £1,721 7s. 4d. Being continued with an ever-increasing income, its annual average for the first thirty years was £6,800, and for the last three years respectively it has been £9,143, £10,557 and £10,996. How many little wintry journeys do not all these thousands represent! How many timid requests! How many joyous moments! Some of those who went out to test the Christmas generosity of their friends thirty-four years ago are now graying with age, and are sending out their own little ones to take up the good work; while of those who gave, the greater part are certainly gone whither their works do follow them. The moral effects upon both are, however, permanent. Some have thus learned to abound in gifts who otherwise would not have learned at all. And others have been brought into loving sympathy with Christ's work for the world, in whose hearts that sympathy will not readily be allowed to die."

THE National Baptist thinks that the easiest way to settle the communion question is to adopt the theory that "none but members of the local church are entitled to a seat at the Lord's table." The invitation "to members of sister churches in good standing" often includes Open Communionists, and may even include a man who for notorious Open Communionism has been excluded from one church and has joined another which is less rigid. Moreover, the standards of discipline differ widely. There are Baptist churches "membership in which does not afford any evidence, scarcely even a presumption, of regeneration and a holy life. It is constantly happening that a church is inviting to the table persons who, if they were members with it, it would at once discipline and exclude." If the invitation is given to "baptized believers," it certainly includes "the Disciples (or Campbellites,) and the Christ-ians, who are immersed Unitarians." The current methods or invitation are not, therefore, free from serious objections, in the view of the Baptist, and it argues that the only right way is to have it understood that the ordinance is only intended for the individual church.

THE news of the revolution which has placed young Alfonso on the Spanish throne has awakened fresh interest in the gospel work now carried on in that country. Since the beginning of the year we have only had the meager information conveyed through cable dispatches. Two Protestant newspapers suppressed at Madrid gave an unfavorable impression of the new reign at the very outset. These papers must be La Luz, a semi-monthly, founded by Carrasco, and El Christiano, a weekly, owned by the London Tract Society. Then it was reported that a Protestant church had been closed at Cadiz; and, lastly, we have the information that King Alfonso is favorable to religious liberty as it prevails in other countries. The most recent letters from evangelical laborers in Spain date from the beginning of November. Then the Protestants of Madrid were in excellent spirits. A deeper unity had been evoked among the ministers of the various societies than heretofore, and a handbill pleading for the use of the Scriptures, signed by all the evangelical pastors and ex-priests in Madrid, had been circulated before the churches and at the cemetery gates on All Souls' Day, to the amount of twenty thousand copies. The event of the month, however, was the first appearance of the well-known Padre Tornas as an evangelical preacher. His first sermon, on the reading of the Scriptures, was delivered in the enlarged United Presbyterian church, before an audience of one thousand people, composed largely of the higher classes.

CHANGE OF RATES.

In conformity with an agreement between the several papers published in the interest of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, the subscription price of the ADVOCATE, including postage, will hereafter be as follows, viz:

One year	$2 50
Six months	1 50
Three months	80

THE SUBSCRIPTION PRICE of the ADVOCATE is One Dollar and a Quarter per year to ministers of the Gospel, and the same to the widows of deceased itinerant preachers. Where bills have been sent charging them more than that amount it was owing to the fact that they were not known as such to the book-keeper, and if they will inform us the accounts will be corrected. Should they have already paid we will credit the amount overpaid on subscription, or dispose of it as they may order.

LOOK OUT FOR ACKNOWLEDGMENTS.—Subscribers and other persons writing to us should look in the letter list for the acknowledgment of their letters. The letters which reach us on or before Saturday of each week are acknowledged in the issue of the following Thursday.

RATES.

The New Orleans Christian Advocate will be furnished to subscribers hereafter at the following rates, including postage:

One Year	$2 50

Church Pillars.

There were a dozen apostles, but of these Paul tells us that James, Cephas and John "seemed to be pillars" in the church at Jerusalem. Very different kinds of men were they, but each one was strong and useful in his way. The living architecture of the house of God embraces this conception of the superior strength and value of some of its parts. In almost every organization, even of a denominational breadth, there are of necessity those who have this eminence of character and responsibility. On them largely rests the structure to which they belong, and the stability and safety of the whole depends upon their capacity and wisdom. In every society there are usually those who seem to be pillars—sometimes more in the seeming than in the reality. It is a fortunate thing for a church to have in it enough of this sort of material—of men whose broad views, love for Christ, and weight of position and influence can give tone and power to the whole body.

Both for strength and beauty are pillars needed. That is an incomplete edifice, weak and impotent, that is without them. Many a church enterprise has failed, and many an organization has come to naught, because it had none of these strong and capable shafts to support it. The house has not been built, or, if built, it has tumbled down for the want of pillars. The character of a church is usually shaped and determined by a few. Around them cluster the details of the structure, and the general effect is decided by the order and material of their composition. The piety, the intelligence, the method and quality of the benevolence, and the respect which a church commands, depend upon the foremost spirits in it. Not all after the same pattern perhaps, but all should be sound and equal to the responsibility. Whether Doric or Corinthian, Roman, Byzantine or Saracenic, they are to help in sustaining the precious burden that is laid upon them, and in maintaining the symmetry, harmony and unity of the edifice. There are plain, ornate, solid, graceful, but all useful in their places, and contributing to the stability and glory of the temple.

Church pillars may also represent not alone the eminent in gifts and influence, but also the stable elements of the society or congregation. There is always a volatile and restless material, composed of those who float like the sea-weed. They are never well rooted, but move about from church to church, or simply hover on the outskirts, with no very vital tie to the main body. They have no earnest purpose, no serious idea of personal effort and work for Christ. Work for the church, and in it, is not in their comprehension of duty and obligation. Their relation to the church is that of incidental beneficiaries, who feel themselves entitled to what they may see and hear and enjoy, without contributing anything, beyond their fitful presence, to the life and expansion of the divine kingdom in the world. They are pillars who constitute the nucleus of power and effectiveness, always in their places, and faithful to the post of duty under all circumstances. They are as much a part of the religious body as a pillar is a part of the house, and as permanent and steadfast in their relations to it as the columns which bore upon their capitals the arches and corulces of Karnac or the Parthenon.

The progress and prosperity of a church depends greatly upon this strong, healthful heart, whose throbs keep up the circulation and vitality of the organization. This is to the whole as the citadel to the widespread and more vulnerable town. It is the stronghold and the hope of the cause of Christ in every church and community. This old guard, well disciplined, always in battle array, and knowing nothing but fidelity and obedience, is the only dependence. In this respect every Christian may and ought to be a pillar. All should be planted in the house of the Lord, even built into it as an ornament and a support, and contributing in due measure to the firmness and comeliness of the building. In fact, however, the pillars, as compared with the lighter and more chaffy material, are few. The church, as "the pillar and ground of the truth," is made up of the faithful ones, and by them the truth is exhibited and spread abroad. Between the real church and the world there is this boundary between light and shade—a penumbra which partakes almost equally of the good and the bad.

Another aspect of church pillars is given in the promise to the church in Philadelphia: "Him that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temple of my God, and he shall go no more out." The reference is probably to monumental pillars, as the promise continues: "And I will write upon him the name of my God, and the name of the city of my God, which is new Jerusalem, which cometh down out of heaven from my God; and I will write upon him my new name." A faithful Christian here is always a monument of grace. He bears inscriptions which God has written, but his office is service chiefly, rather than reward. To be made a pillar in heaven is the promise to him that overcometh. Whatever of this honor and glory comes within the experience here, the most is beyond earth, and in the world of light. Not every believer, by reason of extraordinary office or endowments, can be counted as a pillar in the house of God on earth, but the humblest who has overcome will be a pillar in heaven. And those who have been pillars in the militant church, by their firmness and fidelity in the work of Christ, shall have the peculiar distinction of exhibiting through all eternity the love of him who has redeemed them from sin and death.

From the earthly temple the pillars are removed. The strongest and most graceful are broken by age and death. The Jachin and Boaz of Solomon's temple, and the great temple itself, are no more. The pillars of Trajan, Pompey and the Column Vendome must perish. The sculpture, the entablatures, the reliefs and hieroglyphics of ancient art, and all the devices and records of earthly heraldry, are doomed to pass and fade away. Him that overcometh shall alone bear the imperishable name and forever wear the memorials of triumph. "He shall go no more out." A monument of mercy and grace, shining resplendent with the glory of holiness and in the light of God, he is to shine on and forever. These are the pillar-saints of the Bible, not ascetics who have stood on pillars, but faithful workers in the church below, crowned and emblazoned as pillars in heaven.

Pastors' Duties and Delinquencies.

Now, Mr. Editor, if we go into this letter, and come out of it as we go into and come out of a cold bath, we shall at least come out of it in a hurry. Well, we will try and not be tedious.

The pastor is supposed to be everywhere and to know everything; and as we have plenty of educated young men and women, sons and daughters of Methodist families, he may do much good by distributing efficient teachers through the country. There is also a great deal of school property under the supervision of the church, which, if properly husbanded, will some day develop into good high schools and colleges. If no one else will do this work—and it is often the case that they will not—then the pastor must do it. It is made his duty by virtue of a greater degree of interest which he has awakened in him for the salvation of mankind.

During the late war Mansfield Female College became involved in debt, and would have been lost to the church had it not been for a voluntary and almost desperate effort upon the part of Bishop Keener to save it. It stands to-day out of debt, secure to the church, worth $30,000, a monument to his love for the church and the cause of education.

Another duty of the pastor is to receive, try and expell members. He is the shepherd of the flock, and in an important sense is responsible for it. He should make every proper exertion and use all laudable means to induce sinners to seek religion and join the church; but this is not his most difficult task. It is as much his duty to try and expell members as it is to receive them. The interest of the church is often as much promoted by pruning as by grafting. And the pastor is not to wait till a leader or steward makes a formal complaint against a delinquent member. True, it is their duty to give such information to the pastor; but where they fail he must act independently. But who has the grace and nerve to stand up face to face and shoulder such responsibilities? Of course all prudential means should be used to save a delinquent member; but when these fail the good of the church absolutely demands that he be cut off. The pastor also must see that his members observe a fast on Friday preceding each quarterly meeting—a practice which has almost become obsolete, so far as our observation goes; yet if it was ever necessary, it is equally so to-day, and the pastor is to see that it is done. But how? Well, he must preach about it and talk about it, and enforce it by precept and example. Bishop Marvin talked a half hour on this subject before the Conference in Baton Rouge before receiving candidates into the ministry, and the consequence was that nearly all the ministers and church members fasted, and the result was that nearly everybody got happy on the occasion, and a gracious revival of religion followed. You may say: "Ah! but we cannot talk like a Bishop." Why not? He said nothing but what was plain, simple, and understood by everybody; and we have determined, while writing this, to say some of the very things which he said the next opportunity which we have.

Besides, the pastor must keep faithful and accurate records of all church matters. The names of persons baptized, infants and adults, received and expelled, must be duly reported and placed on record. This is not the most unimportant part of his work. Not long since we listened to a presiding elder's Quarterly Conference questions and heard the pastor's answers. 1. "Is there a written report of the number and state of Sunday schools," etc? Answer.—"No; I intended to write, but—" Presiding elder.—"I suppose you may say as before: 'Pastor.' Yes, that will do. The secretary will put it down." 2. "What is doing for the cause of missions?" Answer.—"No report"—though a missionary society had just been organized, and a great many persons had joined it. 3. "Is there a written report on the state of the church?" Answer.—"No—ah—but the secretary may put it down good." The Discipline suggests the answer, and the answer good here has about as much connection with the one suggested as it has with the man in the moon. If some of these church records could be taken up twenty years hence they would be as unmeaning as you could imagine.

The pastor must by his deportment and labor convince the people that the burden of his mission is their salvation. All his work must be done and reported on, item by item, at each Annual Conference. No wonder it comes often before he is ready for it, and that the Conference year apparently is short. He ought not have any hinderances. J. P.

Love for the Church.

The religion of Jesus goes to the bottom of a man's nature, and stirs up its deepest affections and awakens its highest regards. Whenever it touches the soul a pure flame of love is enkindled, which arises as grateful incense to the Lord. The heart goes out in fervent devotion to God, and the mind shows a willingness to put forth effort wherever he directs. Whenever this religion breaks in upon the soul, enlightening the understanding by its radiant beams, and softening the heart by its holy influences, all the affections are deeply enamored of God and his cause, and there is produced a devoted adhesion to whatever is in harmony with his will. In one sense religion is fervor. To become religious is to become a "partaker of the divine nature." This nature is a fervent nature. It is symbolized in the word of the Lord by "fires and flames." When a man's soul is warmed by the presence and influence of the Holy Spirit there naturally arises a fervent love for the church. The depth and intensity of this love show the measure of the religion of the heart. If a pure religion glows in the heart, its reflections will brighten the actions of the life. Earnest religion working in the soul manifests itself by earnest work for God in the world. The man who is full of the Spirit of the Lord will enter with zeal into all plans calculated to increase the prosperity of the church, and he will work diligently in all her services, and he will dedicate himself to her by a perpetual act of consecration. The Christian loves the church, and he denies himself for her good. Like the captive Jew, upon whose mind there came rushing sad memories of lost glory and power, he "prefers Jerusalem above his chief joy." He loves the church because Jesus loves it. Jesus suffered for the church; therefore he loves it. Jesus bought the church with his precious blood, and on this account the Christian loves it. Jesus died for it; therefore the disciple loves it. Jesus left as a legacy to the church words of wisdom which have never failed to thrill the heart of humanity, and for this reason the Christian loves it. Jesus executed in favor of the church a testament which gives her an indefeasible title to an "inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away," and therefore the Christian loves it. The Christian loves the church, and the result of this love is work—earnest, steady, faithful work. Though the church may be in a lukewarm condition, though her ordinances may be neglected and her altars forsaken, though she may lie in the dust, covered with shame and confusion, yet the pious Christian, realizing that she is still "beautiful for situation," and being assured that "out of Zion, the perfection of beauty, God hath shined," still permits his affections to flow out with fervor toward her, and to entwine with tenderness around her, even in her desolation, and exclaims with the patriotic Jew: "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning."

Reader, do you have this sort of love for the church of God? The labor of your every-day life answers the question. In the existence and ordinances and privileges of the church you are reaping the benefits of the blood of Jesus, and the blessings which have come upon the world in answer to the prayers of his disciples. Will you not send these blessings and benefits along after you to your children, enlarged in volume and deepened in preciousness, by your own prayers and tears and struggles and self-denials for the kingdom of God?

From China.

Through the courtesy of Mrs. S. B. Thomas we are permitted to make the following extract from a letter of December 30, 1874, written to her by Rev. J. W. Lambuth, of our China mission:

SHANGHAI, CHINA, Dec. 30, 1874.

MRS. S. B. THOMAS—My Dear Sister: We thank you very much for the deep interest you have ever manifested for the cause of God among the heathen. We need the help, all the help possible, and the prayers of God's people everywhere. We need to unite our efforts with the noble and untiring efforts of Christian people in America and in England.

I am sorry to know from many friends that there is a great deal of opposition to missionaries coming to China. I cannot understand why this is the case. I know the people in California have been working against the Chinese for a long while, and would like to prevent their emigration to America if they could do so. I know, too, that Chinese are not, in their present state of ignorance and idolatry, a people to be loved and admired. But for all that we can pity them, and pray the Lord to enlighten their understandings and save their souls. They are a proud, haughty people, who, like the proud Pharisee, do not think themselves as bad as other people, and esteem themselves far better. We must expect this when they are so perfectly ignorant of all morality, and are so utterly regardless of all uprightness. We need more prayer and more faith, that the Spirit of God may come in power, convicting and converting and turning sinners to Christ, the only Savior and Redeemer of the world.

We are having a genuine work of grace among the seamen and mariners of American and English men-of-war in Shanghai. We have them—that is, many of them—to come to our house on Saturday night for a meeting, and on other nights in the week they have meetings elsewhere. They have also excellent meetings aboard ship. We do expect great results from these meetings. Many years ago our sailors and mariners would come on shore and act in such a way that the heathen themselves would look on in wonder and astonishment, and then call them barbarians. But now they are made happy, and, instead of trying to deprive the poor Chinaman of his life, they are trying to save them, and thus are helping the missionary. Should we not give thanks to God for this blessed work which is going on in the hearts of these noble-hearted sailors?

In this letter I send a photograph of some of the girls and the teacher of the school. Among the number is Susan, who is a good girl, and bids fair to make a useful woman. She studies well, and is anxious to learn fast and learn well, and prepare herself for future work. I do hope she may make a useful woman in the church.

I send you in this a photograph of Mrs. Lambuth's Bible women's reading-room. This is a very encouraging feature of the work of the missionary in China. It is very difficult to get at the women in China, and this plan, through the help of God, will succeed. I feel sure, and will be the means of carrying truth home to hundreds who would not otherwise hear the glad news of salvation. Mrs. Lambuth now has three Bible women at work beside her school. Cannot the Christian women of our own church organize societies of their own, and send out Christian women to work among these poor degraded heathen women of China? The churches North are doing this, and it must tell for good in the future. I do hope some of our churches in the South may be able to do the same.

I am, as ever, your brother in Christ, J. W. LAMBUTH.

Daniel Webster and the Newspaper.

Small is the sum that is required to patronize a newspaper, and amply rewarded is its patron, I care not how humble and unpretending the gazette which he takes. It is next to impossible to fill a sheet with printed matter without putting into it something that is worth the subscription price. Every parent whose son is away from home at school should supply him with a newspaper. I well remember what a marked difference there was between those of my schoolmates who had, and those who had not, access to newspapers. Other things being equal, the first were always decidedly superior to the last in debate, composition and general intelligence.—Daniel Webster.

We find the above going the rounds, and credited to Daniel Webster. It is true, and worthy of the great expounder. What he says of secular papers applies with peculiar force to religious journals. The difference between members of our churches who read a good religious paper, and those who do not, is palpable to any pastor who will take the trouble to observe it. He will feel it in the very atmosphere of the homes he visits, he will see it in the faces of those to whom he preaches, and it will be specially manifest in the character and efficiency of the official members. Not until our people read—habitually and with zest read—a weekly Methodist paper will they come up to the best standard of intelligence and living piety.

Breaking Ground.

A new Southern Methodist church is about to be built on St. Charles avenue, in the Sixth District of this city. The site chosen is in the midst of a most beautiful and growing section, and a corner on one of the finest thoroughfares in New Orleans. The style of the edifice is to be a modernized light Gothic, brick, with tower and spire. The entire depth, including tower, will be 114 feet. The audience-room, excluding the spacious vestibule, 80 by 50 feet in the clear. There is to be no basement, but a chapel for Sunday school and social meetings is to be erected in the rear. The lot is ample, being 100 feet front on the avenue and having a depth of 200 feet. The architect and builder were on the ground on Monday morning last, and the work has been begun. It will be pushed forward as rapidly as possible, with the expectation of completing it at an early day. This enterprise is due to the generous efforts and liberal devisings of one of our most prominent citizens and Methodists—R. W. Rayne, of New Orleans.

ANOTHER GOOD EXAMPLE.—The annual collection for foreign missions was taken up at the Carondelet Street church, of this city, on Sunday morning last, February 28. The amount in cash and cards was $600.

We may mention in this connection that Mr. Miles W. Burford, of Indianapolis, Indiana, has given Bishop Keener $50 for the Mexican mission. Mr. Burford is a zealous member of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, and is at present on a visit to our city.

MRS. RUTH A. STICKNEY died at the residence of her son-in-law, E. E. F. Ross, in New Orleans, on the twenty-second of February. Mrs. Stickney was born in Virginia, and for nearly forty years she was a devoted Christian and an exemplary member of the Methodist Church. She died rather suddenly of disease of the heart. Her last hours were eminently peaceful and happy. We tender to the bereaved our sincere sympathy in the sorrow that has cast a shadow upon their home and hearts.

OUR YOUNG READERS will find in their corner, on the sixth page, the beginning of a series of interesting stories by Grandpa Goodale. We know the venerable author well, and his contributions will be appreciated.

The Blood of the Martyrs.

Our Christian community, says the Pacific Methodist (San Francisco, California,) has been electrified at the reception of the news of the massacre of their Mexican brethren at Acapulco.

Rev. H. N. Hutchinson, superintendent of Presbyterian missions in central and southern Mexico, arrived in this city on the Montana last week. He was a fugitive from the mob which devastated a church and slaughtered Christian worshipers in Acapulco, January 26, 1875. The facts, as related by him, are as follows: While in the City of Mexico, the headquarters of his work, he was solicited to afford relief to a band of Protestants which had been growing up among the Catholic population of Acapulco. He determined to traverse the wild country which separated the two cities, and give them such service as was in his power. He found a growing disposition among the people to listen to the truths as taught by Protestants, and also a hostile and proscriptive spirit among the ignorant classes, which was unfortunately fed and inspired by the invectives of a Catholic priest.

A house was secured and a series of protracted services was entered upon. They were several times warned that the Indians were threatening to attack the church. On the evening of the twenty-sixth of January Mr. Hutchinson was ill and remained at home, and that evening the fatal and bloody work was done. The church was invaded while the congregation was worshiping, and they were attacked with pistols and machetes; five were killed outright and ten or twelve wounded. Senor Diaz, the editor of a local paper and member of the State Congress, was a member of the congregation, and at the time leading the services. He was the first to receive the assault while sitting in the pulpit. His wife, a heroic woman, rushed to his rescue, and with a pistol-shot killed his assailant. The fighting was fearful. The pulpit and organ were hacked to pieces by the mob, while the assailed party defended themselves as best they could, killing four or five of their assailants and wounding a number. The military were soon on the ground and quiet was restored. Mr. Hutchinson was advised to leave, and as the only safe egress was by sea he came to this city last week.

Last Sunday afternoon the large Tabernacle on Tyler street was densely packed with sympathizing people for the purpose of hearing from the lips of Mr. Hutchinson the details of the horrid tragedy, and offering their meed of consolation. Several ministers participated in the exercises. Strange to say, none of our liberal and intelligent Catholic fellow-citizens were present to denounce the fearful deed which rests upon their church. A hymn-book, dabbled with the blood of the martyred ones, was held up before the audience, and a shudder ran through the mass of people. It was probably the first martyr blood they had ever seen. Resolutions expressing sympathy were adopted by the meeting.

Let all the church pray for our missionaries in Mexico. Their field is one of danger and glorious hope.

Our City Churches.

At the recent session of our Conference changes were made all around. Rev. R. B. Downer, transferred from the Mississippi Conference, has taken Bro. Ivy's place at Cadiz Street, and is moving on hopefully. Louisiana Avenue, under the pastoral care of the editor, is said to be doing fairly. Felicity Street, under Dr. Walker, is fresh and vigorous. Caroudelet Street, under Bro. Mathews' powerful ministry, is prospering. Morgan Street, under Bro. Sawyer's earnest and inspiring efforts, has apparently taken a new departure, and begins to look like the palmiest days of this old and important charge. The church in Algiers—across the river—under the pastoral care of Rev. Lewis A. Reed, was perhaps never in a better condition than now. The German charges, under their pastors, and the presiding eldership of Bro. Ahrens, are growing healthfully. The congregations at the Dryades Street German church are reported as unusually large. The Sunday schools are doing a good work, but there is room for improvement.

REV. DR. FITZGERALD, writing to the Pacific Methodist, February 15, says:

The work of God in Santa Rosa goes on with increasing power. About fifty persons have been converted, mostly from the advanced classes of our students. Glad news is going to many homes in various parts of this State. Yesterday (Sunday) twenty-four persons joined the church, twenty-one of whom are converts of this meeting. The altar last night was filled with penitents. Crowds have to go away every night, unable to gain admission to the church, so great is the interest in the community. Conversions are "old-fashioned," clear and profound. At our young people's meeting, on Saturday at two P. M., nearly a hundred were present; and such a meeting I never saw before. The tide of joy was at high-water mark. Let prayer be made for us by all the church.

THROUGH the secretary of the board of administrators, J. D. Lichtenberger, we have received a copy of the annual report of the Charity Hospital. It is a document of much interest, and filled with valuable information.

OVER one hundred persons have recently united with the First church, St. Louis, Rev. T. M. Finney, pastor.

REV. E. P. HAMMOND commenced union meetings in San Francisco, on Sunday, February 21.

The Boston Resolutions.

Last week we published from the pen of a Missouri brother a disclaimer for Bishop Bowman. One of our cotemporaries of the Methodist Episcopal Church South has put in a word for others of the Northern Bishops who happened to be in Baltimore, and delivered their minds conversationally on the subject of Dr. Ives' infamous speech, if not on the resolutions.

The Holston Methodist, which keeps a sharp watch on the matter, quotes the resolutions from the Boston Herald as follows:

"Resolved, That we, the Methodist preachers of Boston and vicinity, in our regular preachers' meeting assembled, tender our grateful thanks to U. S. Grant, President of the United States, for the prompt manner in which he has discharged his constitutional obligations by sending troops under his command to the State of Louisiana to suppress the riotous proceedings of a lawless mob; and we also thank the commanding general, Phil. H. Sheridan, for the summary manner in which he has discharged his duties.

"Resolved, That the thanks of this meeting be presented to Wendell Phillips, Esq., for his speech in Faneuil Hall, on the fifteenth instant, in which he defended in so masterly a manner the constitutionality of the administration in upholding law and order in New Orleans, and exposed with such withering scorn the assumption of the meeting in Faneuil Hall as being in any sense the voice of Boston."

The resolutions were unanimously adopted by a rising vote. General Sheridan has since returned thanks, as reported in the last issue of the Advocate. In regard to these resolutions Bishop Haven, in Zion's Herald, says:

"I cannot put up the pencil before I congratulate my Boston brothers over the grand words of their preachers' meeting on the national situation. How often have its words rung out for the direction of the nation, but never better than now. The church must speak the word bravely. Our country must be saved by the men of to-day. Yesterday for yesterday's heroes—to-day for to-day's. No man sees the situation better than the President; and if Phillips commends, the country which has followed him so long may well pause before it condemns. The South must be saved by the 'sleeping giant,' as Sumner styled the opening clause in the constitution. That is the duty of to-day. Thank God that our Massachusetts ministry leads the column in its declaration."

It will be recollected that Bishop Bowman was represented in the account generally published as contributing to this interesting occasion, giving "an account of what he knew about the treatment of colored people in Louisiana, narrating a number of instances in which they had been shamefully abused, and deprived of life even." Now, while we do not like Bishop Haven's sentiments, we do approve of his present course—he puts himself to record. We have not seen his letter, but take it for grauted he is correctly quoted. If his colleagues disapprove of Dr. Ives' speech and of the Boston resolutions, now so conspicuously before the country, why do they not publish it so over their responsible signatures? Leaving such grave matters to be set right by after-dinner speeches and table-talk is not exactly to the mind of our people when the delicate question of fraternity is pending. What says their official press about it? Do their editors condemn, or do they applaud like those who were present? We should like to hear from them. Indeed we have heard from them. They are constantly uttering sentiments like those of Dr. Ives, though not perhaps couched in such ferocious terms. We have a number of them now before us, but we have not room for their insertion. The editor of the Northern Christian Advocate, published at Syracuse, has, indeed, spoken kindly of the Southern Church, and has been abused for so doing by his own brethren. His utterances were mild enough—he thinks the Southern ministers who attended the Round Lake camp meeting "are honest Christian men"—we are rather of that opinion. But we do not wonder that "Tray, Blanch and Sweetheart" are let loose on the Syracuse editor when he makes the following admission as to the intrusion of the Northern Church:

"There can be no fraternity where either is unreasonably running a rival interest to the injury of the other—that is, if the North expresses its full confidence in the Methodism of the South, in its ministers, its Bishops and churches, as true men and true Methodist Christians, then it will not be fraternal for Northern Methodists to establish rival churches in the same neighborhoods and communities, and weaken and destroy those existing. Such a course would certainly destroy all fraternity, if practiced by either party. If, on either side, the policy is to 'disintegrate' and 'absorb' the other, it is worse than folly to talk of fraternity. Let us be honest with each other—honest friends of honest opponents. It would not be fraternal for the Methodists of the South to come North, if they could, and seek to establish Southern Methodist churches in all our towns and villages, unless they believed we were corrupt and false to our duty as Christians, withholding the gospel from the poor and needy. The truth is—and we might as well, and much better, meet it openly than covertly—the two Methodisms, as rivals, cannot occupy the South fraternally."

As there is some doubt about what Bishop Bowman said concerning the South, and where and when he said it, we should like for him to set the matter at rest by a communication, over his own signature, as explicit as that of Bishop Haven. There must be no dodging. If our Northern brethren want fraternity—as we do—they must officially and explicitly repudiate the assertions attributed to their representative men, which rank us with cut-throats and banditti, and show that they are such themselves. Of course if we are villains they can have no brotherly intercourse with us, and if they want us exterminated by fire and sword, we want no more said about Round Lake camp meetings and fraternal committees.—Nashville Christian Advocate.

Revivals in the Family.

Thousands of Christians have been praying for a revival during the past two months. Shall the great spiritual season pass without a general work of grace? One was never more needed. The Presbyterian says that it is a mischievous deception which looks for the hinderances in the church, and that it sets to a fruitless tinkering in the wrong place; that the real hinderances are in the family. It is there, if anywhere, that the cursed wedge of gold is covered up; that the Spirit of God is grieved; that the wing of faith is broken. Our houses must be set in order for the invited Guest. It says:

"We are prepared, from some years of careful observation, to say that our experience confirms us in the belief that we never look in the right place for the movement of the reviving Spirit. We look in the church only for indications. But we have never known of a revival starting there. It is made public there. But when investigation was pushed to the sources, in every instance it had begun in somebody's family; the life-giving, life-increasing treasure first appeared in some solitary but overburdened Christian heart or hearts; within the circle of the family. Some mother in agony about her son; a sister in distress for her brother; an importunate wife for a godless husband; some father, like a discomfited Jacob, though thigh-smitten, in desperation laying hold on Omnipotence, binding God's hands by his own promises until he has gained the victory.

"A revival of religion is always a family matter, and a household movement in its beginnings. It starts in the closet, and comes in answer often to the prayers and tears of a solitary petitioner. There is no place on earth so near the heart of the Redeemer, or half so omnipotent, as that place which he named 'closet.' When the history of the world's moral triumphs shall be made known, we may all be more surprised than at any other revelation in glory, that so many were organized and completed in this family holy of holies. We know a minister, owned of God in his work, whose wayward footsteps were arrested on the broad road to death by the sight of a mother kneeling upon the kitchen hearth, when she thought all but herself sleeping, pleading for the guilty son whose eye was resting upon her, whose ear heard the only words that had ever touched his heart.

"We have personal knowledge of a revival in an unusually wicked place, which began in the closet of a distressed wife, who saw her husband's health failing, and his heart growing more desperate in its hatred of God; overwhelmed at his dark prospect, she sought this place of solitude to talk with God, and one day, while on her knees, these words came to her mind: 'I have heard thy prayer; I have seen thy tears; I will heal thy husband.' Upon this assurance she went to see three others whose husbands were companions in guilt with her own, and the four agreed to pray together an hour each day of the coming week, which preceded the communion. Preparatory services began on Friday night. At the close the minister said that on Saturday after the morning sermon any who might wish to unite with the church on profession, or converse with the session on the subject, could remain. He did not know that there was a convicted sinner in the whole town; but to his utter amazement this wretched, dying husband and one of his companions presented themselves, under the deepest convictions, and from this moment the Spirit of God was felt to be there with power, and about one hundred and twenty-five persons made profession of religion, including the four unbelieving husbands."

PERSONAL REMINISCENCES, ANECDOTES AND LETTERS OF GENERAL ROBERT E. LEE. By Rev. J. William Jones, D. D. New York: D. Appleton & Co., 1875.

The work is not a biography. It is not the complete life of the great Confederate general, but it contains the materials needed to make up a true estimate of his character. The author is a minister of the Baptist Church, who had the best of opportunities of knowing General Lee personally, and who was most favorably circumstanced to collect the information needed. We have Lee as the soldier and the college president in the first two chapters, and after these, in successive chapters: Duty the Key-Note of his Life; Modesty, Humility, Simplicity and Gentleness; His Spirit of Self-Denial for the Good of Others; His Social Character; His Love for His Soldiers; His Domestic Life; His Christian Character; His Sickness and Death. The steel engravings—six in number—are very fine, and there are, besides, thirteen well-finished wood cuts. The volume is mostly a compilation and arrangement of reminiscences, anecdotes and letters, and is a very readable book, and contains more entertaining, accurate and reliable information about General Lee than anything hitherto published. It is an octavo of over 500 pages, handsomely bound, and paper and typography unexceptionable. This splendid work is sold only by subscription. For particulars our readers are referred to the advertisement of the publishers in another column.

CROWNING TESTIMONY. New York: W. C. Palmer, Jr., 1875.

This is a pamphlet containing Mrs. Phoebe Palmer's last communication to the Christian public. The article is entitled "Refining Processes," and is a lithographed fac-simile of Mrs. Palmer's manuscript and handwriting. It is a very beautiful and interesting memorial of a good and useful Christian woman.

THE Illustrated Household Magazine is issued monthly by Woods' Household Publishing Company, New York. We have received the March number.

TYNDALL AND MOODY.—Dr. Cuyler writes to the Independent: "By the way, a remarkable train of circumstances has lately occurred in Belfast, Ireland, which to my mind looks like more than a mere coincidence. In July last the British Association of Science met there, and the brilliant Tyndall uttered some sharp words, which grieved and wounded the friends of evangelical faith not a little. 'No small stir arose about that way.' A few weeks afterward our countrymen, Messrs. Moody and Sankey, visit Belfast and commence a series of religious services. Fervent prayers are put up all over Ireland for a divine blessing upon the labors of two plain, honest preachers of Jesus Christ. What happens? All Belfast is shaken as it never was before. Multitudes hear the word gladly. Drunkards quit their whisky and become sober men. Intelligent men are converted. The vicious are made better. There stand the undeniable results. And now the believers in Christ and in prayer can send over to their late guests, the skeptical scientists: 'Come and see!'"

PAY POSTAGE.—Subscribers whose subscriptions have been paid at the old rates—viz.: two dollars per year—and whose subscriptions run into 1875, are required under the new postage law, which goes into effect January 1, to pay postage at the office of mailing. The subscription price hereafter includes the postage. Two cents per month each month that the subscription has to run, will be sufficient to pay for the ADVOCATE.

RISKS ON REMITTANCES.—Money may be sent to the publisher of the ADVOCATE in payment of subscriptions, in amounts not exceeding ten dollars, by registered letter, at his risk. Any amounts may be sent by express or postoffice money order at his risk, provided that in all the above cases the expense of remitting be borne by the person who remits. Otherwise it will be at their own risk.

FOR choice family groceries we would refer our readers to J. H. Peyton, corner of Magazine and Philip streets. Mr. Peyton engages to furnish good articles at reasonable prices. See his advertisement.

WE NOTICE that those enterprising gentlemen, Messrs. R. W. Rayne & Co., have reduced the price of their well known Arrow Tie. Planters and buyers will find their advertisement of interest.

SEE advertisement of Paul Sauvé, stationer, printer and blank-book manufacturer Orders for cotton sampling paper, bank and insurance printing, law briefs, etc., promptly attended to.

READ Levy Bros.' advertisement.

DRY GOODS.—We know of no house in New Orleans to which we could more unhesitatingly direct our friends for the purchase of dry goods than to that of Messrs. Hirsselman & Adams, 586 and 588 Magazine street. Their spring goods are now constantly arriving from the North and Europe. Those residing in any part of the country will have samples and prices of goods forwarded them, free of cost, on application. Where an order exceeds $10 freight will be prepaid by the firm. Their advertisement, on the eighth page, will repay reading.

THE DIAMOND COTTON PLANTER, CHOPPER AND CULTIVATOR.—We are pleased to see that this valuable implement, advertised in our columns and extensively introduced last year, is now sold under a guarantee to give satisfaction. An excellent corn planter attachment has been added to it, and it has been greatly improved since last season. See advertisement elsewhere.

SHADINES.—Messrs. McGrath & Compton are the wholesale agents for Hoope & Co.'s shadines. It is unnecessary for us to say anything in favor of this delicious dish, as the public are fully aware of its excellence. For sale by all grocers. See advertisement.

WE WOULD call attention to the advertisement, in another column, of the Southern Seed and Plant Company, of Gallatin, Tennessee. They make a specialty of rare seeds and plants.

ANY one in need of furniture would do well to read the advertisement of John Bois. Furniture also removed, stored and repaired. See advertisement.

SEE Dr. Warrington's advertisement elsewhere.

SHADINES—SHADINES.

TO THE PUBLIC.

Five years since, after previous years of experience in the propagation and preservation of Shadines, or young shad, we first introduced our fish to the American people.

Shadines are put up in hermetically-sealed tin boxes, perfectly boneless, in a mild, pleasing, appetizing sauce, palatable to all, free from oil (so objectionable in sardines,) retaining only the natural richness of the shad, and ready for the table at all times—for dinner, lunch or evening meal—by merely opening the box. A daily want for every family during Lent.

Bear in mind, we are the original and only packers of Shadines, and every genuine box has the letters H. & C. pressed on each side.

The Child's Corner.

LITTLE WIGGLE.

BY MARY E. HENDERSON.

Cuddle and kiss, little baby;
Hug me and love me, my sweet;
Dance up and down like a lady;
Clap hands and swing your pink feet.

Open your jewel-box, darling!
Show all your pearls with one smile;
Now, with an all-over wriggle,
Creep on the carpet awhile.

Then, back again in a minute,
Climb to your place on my knee;
Creep-a-mouse, creep a-mouse, baby,
Where can that little mouse be?

Lay your small head on my shoulder,
Take a good pull at my hair,
And, like the fly on the paper,
Crawl down the back of my chair.

Never at rest for an instant,
Rolling and capering so;
Sweetest, best rogue of a baby,
When do you manage to grow?

FOR THE ADVOCATE.

The Bear Story.

MY DEAR CHILDREN: I am a very old man, and am therefore nearer to you in almost every respect than I ever was before. If you will look at a compass you will see what I mean. Start at any point, as north, for example, and "box the compass," as the sailors call it—that is, go round it, naming the points as you go. Very soon, don't you see, you come back to the starting-point again? So this life of ours is very much like the circle on the compass. Call the north point "Childhood" in starting, if you will, you soon—oh, very soon, it seems to me—get back to it again, and then you must call it "Old Age." So, though I am a very old man, I am still a child—in my "second childhood" my grandchildren, some of whom are stout men, call it; and I do not find it so very unlike the first one as you might suppose. My "little ones" all like to gather round me, now the evenings are getting longer, and listen to the stories I tell them about my first childhood, which seems to them so long ago, and to me but yesterday. Would you like me to tell you some of these stories too? Little Charlie, who always jumps for a place on my knee, and looks with his bright, sparkling eyes up into mine, says:

"Grandpa, your 'tories are a heap better'n tum in Taint 'Icolas."

"Well, little Charlie, what one shall it be?".

"Oh," Charlie says, "the Bear 'tory, of course."

"But, Charlie, my boy, if I am to tell them all my stories, hadn't I better begin at the beginning?"

But Charlie says: "No, no, grandpa, about the big black bear;" and little Harry says: "The bear, the bear;" and all the little folks chime in: "The bear;" and so, if you will listen, I will tell you

HOW I KILLED THE BIG BLACK BEAR.

It was ever so long ago, for I remember well I was just turning thirteen, and my father had just given me the gun he had so long promised I should have when I reached this age; and we were living near the Penobscot river, way down in Maine. It was a wild country then, and my father was one of the earliest settlers, and had just got a small farm cleared up and burned off, and we were living in a log house, with only two small rooms. I must not stop now to tell you of the fine house we had after awhile, or it would be bed-time before we get to the bear. It was in the fall of the year, and we were just commencing to harvest our corn and potatoes to be ready for the winter. Well, one morning just after breakfast Farmer Bolton rode up on his brown mare and told my father that he had found the trail of a large bear that had been committing great havoc in the neighborhood for nearly two weeks. He had upset nearly all of Farmer Baker's bee-hives and stolen all the honey, and he had trodden down the corn in ever so many fields, and two or three of the farmers said that they had found some of their sheep half eaten, which they laid to him. Perhaps you little folks can tell whether he killed them or not. At any rate, everybody in that country was afraid of bears, and always turned out to hunt them whenever they heard of one being about. You may well believe that I was anxious to try my new gun, and begged hard to be allowed to join the party of hunters which was to start the next morning; but mother said I was too small—that the bear would eat me up. But Farmer Bolton plead for me, and finally father took up my side and mother consented, provided I would keep close to him all the time.

That day seemed a very long one to me. I kept getting down my gun and scraping the flints, and putting fresh priming into the pans. You know we used flint-locks in those days; and I laid awake half the night wishing the morning would come; and when at last I fell asleep I dreamed that I was way out in the woods with Buck—our big yellow bull-dog—waiting for the bear to come, and all at once he came, sure enough, crashing through the bushes, and Buck sprang out and caught him by the throat, and then I raised my gun and was about to shoot him; but the gun snapped and wouldn't go off, and the bear saw me and gave a spring, and—then I woke up and heard the horns of the hunters, just outside my window, calling the dogs. I sprang up and dressed very quick, and, though a good deal frightened by my dream, was none the less determined to go. But I took another look at my primings, and Farmer Bolton and father examined them and said they were all right, and I noticed them looking at each other as though they thought I would not be likely to test them.

And then we all started on foot—for the woods were too thick for horses—and went first to Farmer Baker's, where the bear had robbed a bee-hive two nights before. We talked about the bear all the way. Father said: "Old Bruin must have got his nose stung poking among the bees;" and Mr. Hand, the schoolmaster, said he would sting it worse than the bees did if he could get a crack at it with his rifle. At last we reached Farmer Baker's, and the dogs began snuffing all around the bee-hives, and one of them got stung and commenced rolling in the grass. At last one old hound commenced to bark, and started off for the woods at full run, with all the other hounds after him. Old Buck didn't know anything about hunting bears, and he kept close to us as we hastened on after the hounds.

Just as we reached the edge of the woods the hunters divided so as to surround that part of the woods where the dogs seemed to think the bear was hid, father and I keeping together and taking the side nearest "our house." After we had gone about a mile through the underbrush we came to a small clearing, where the blackberry bushes had grown up thick on a piece of burned ground, which was called "The Gore." We could still hear the dogs baying away to the north of us, but the sound was very indistinct. Here father, thinking, I suppose, that I was very tired, told me to stay with Buck and rest, and he would push on over where the dogs were. I didn't much like being left out of the chase in this way; but, to tell the truth, I was really very tired, and the chances of my killing the bear seemed much less than when we set out. Besides, the blackberries were not all gone yet, and I had been too anxious in the morning to eat any breakfast; and—well, Buck and I staid, at any rate, and we waited for two good hours, during which time we had lost all sound of the hounds. But at last, just as I was thinking about going home, I caught the sound again, and it kept coming nearer and nearer, and louder and louder, and at last I heard the bushes crashing under a heavy tread; and then, sure enough, coming through them, I saw, just as I had seen in my dream, a big black bear. Oh, how large and fierce and terrible he looked, and it had all happened so quick! I must confess it, children, I was terribly frightened, and so, I think, was Buck, but he looked from me to the bear as though he would defend me if it cost him his life, and gave a low growl, and then, with a spring that seemed like a flash of light, he had the monster by the throat. I began now to recover my composure, and determined that Buck should not be killed if I could help it; and I saw that the splendid fellow was in great danger, for the bear had risen straight up on to his hind legs and was hugging Buck in his arms so tight that it seemed to me I could hear his bones crack. I couldn't stand this, so I raised my gun, and, taking good aim, I let old Bruin have both barrels at once just behind the fore leg. There was a report and a crash, and then I saw the bear on his back, and Buck came crawling out of the tangle of the bear's legs, and wagged his stub tail just as though he had killed the bear himself.

I mustn't tell you how proud I was, nor how father hugged me almost as hard as the bear had hugged Buck, and said he never would have forgiven himself if the bear had hurt me, for my story is already too long; but I kept that bear-skin for a blanket for many years.

"Now, grandpa," says Charlie, "tell us how Barney milked the Boy's Nest." Not to-night, darling; it is bed-time.

GRANDPA GOODALE.

From a Little Friend.

MERIDIAN, MISS., Feb. 18, 1875.

DEAR MR. EDITOR: I have never written to you before. I don't think I can write quite well enough to write myself. Aunt Melissa will write this letter for me. I think I will soon be able to write my own letters, and then I will take great pleasure in writing to you. I am a little girl eight years old, and my name is Mary Smith. I live in Meridian. I have a papa, mamma, and two little sisters—Lula and Maggie. Lula goes with me to Sunday school. Maggie is not large enough to go. I go to the Methodist Sunday school. We have a very nice, interesting Sunday school. Prof. Adkisson is our superintendent. He is such a good man. I love him very much.

I go to school every day. Miss Annie Scott is my teacher's name. I am reading in the fourth reader, and I study geography and arithmetic too. I am not going to school this week. I am visiting my Grandmother Hall. She lives in the country, four miles from town, on a farm. She has a very pleasant home. I have a nice time at grandma's, feeding her chickens and turkeys, and gathering up eggs. I help to feed Uncle Billy's sheep. They are so nice; and the little lambs—O how pretty and playful they are! I help grandma to do a great many things. She says it is not good to be idle. I intend to try to be industrious, and make myself useful.

Well, I must close; so I remain your loving little friend,

MARY SMITH.

TRUTH AND FALSEHOOD.—"Willie, why were you gone so long for the water?" asked the teacher of a little boy.

"We spilled it, and had to go back and fill the bucket again," was the prompt reply; but the bright, noble face was a shade less bright, less noble than usual, and the eyes dropped beneath the teacher's gaze.

The teacher crossed the room and stood by another, who had been Willie's companion.

"Freddy, were you not gone for the water longer than was necessary?"

For an instant Freddy's eyes were fixed on the floor, and his face wore a troubled look. But it was only for an instant—he looked frankly up to his teacher's face.

"Yes, ma'am," he bravely answered; "we met little Harry Braden and stopped to play with him, and then we spilled the water and had to go back."

Little friends, what was the difference in the answers of the two boys? Neither of them told anything that was not strictly true. Which one of them do you think the teacher trusted more fully after that? And which was the happier of the two?

Farm, Garden and Household.

The Chufa.

In reply to a correspondent Our Home Journal says:

The chufa belongs to the nut grass or sedge family, the cyperaceæ, and its botanical name is Cyperus Esculentus. Much prejudice has existed against the chufa in the South from its resemblance and near relation to the "coco" or Cyperus hydra; but while the latter is one of the most annoying of all pests to the lower coast gardener and planter, and so far has proved itself entirely ineradicable, the former is one of the most profitable and harmless crops that can be raised upon our thin, sandy, piny woods soils. There is no danger that it will ever become a "pest," because it requires cultivation to keep it alive. A two years' neglect in most soils is certain death to it, root and branch. The great trouble is to keep it alive, not to kill it.

We think the statement referred to a little enthusiastic, but do not consider it very far out of the way, because we know the writer very well, and know him to be a close observer, a good cultivator and a reliable stater of facts, and because our own experience for a good many years in the main corroborates his estimate of the value of this too much neglected chicken and hog feed. Our position upon this question is that on our thin, sandy soils the chufa will, with the same cost of culture, produce twice as much nutriment for poultry and hogs as any other crop. This is claiming quite enough merit for it to entitle it to more attention than it is receiving.

We flush our land with fine, deep furrows, and, if very poor or much worn, apply a light coating of superphosphate, cotton seed meal or home-made manure, and thoroughly harrow it in. With a scooter or narrow shovel plow open furrows two and a half feet apart, and in these furrows drop the seed one foot apart, covering with a hoe or harrow. Plant any time in February or March; the latter half of February is the best time in mild seasons, the latter part of March in cold and wet ones. Give one or two plowings with shovel or hull-tongue early in the season, and, if necessary, keep the grass and weeds in subjection by an occasional hoeing. The chufas under this treatment will spread rapidly and soon occupy the whole ground. It is better that hogs should not be turned into the chufa field until after frost has killed the tops. Chickens can be given the free run of the patch at all times after the earliest crop along the line of drill has pretty well matured, say in June. If not gathered too closely by the hogs and chickens, the only thing that will be necessary to renew the crop year after year is to flush up the land in February or March, and give it a good harrowing. Of course after this the hogs and chickens must be kept off until the next June or July.

We have cultivated the chufa more or less extensively since 1855, when it was first introduced from Spain, and the longer we cultivate it the better we like it. We believe strongly also in the profitableness of the pludar as hog feed, and have planted that and the chufa in combination with excellent results.

To plant as we have directed it will take about a peck of seed to the acre.

If our seedsmen have the chufa for sale they keep the fact to themselves. We see no mention made of it in our advertising columns. The seed can probably be had from Alabama or Georgia, at about $1 per quart, sent by mail, postpaid.

How do Fungi Affect Fruit-Trees?

This question is asked frequently, but I have not in one instance learned the real condition of the tree. I have heretofore asserted that no healthy tree or plant can be attacked by fungi. My observation leads me to think that all trees or plants must be, in either roots or limbs, in a decaying state. This, no doubt, is one of the causes why trees and plants are attacked by fungi. I am still of the opinion that bad pruning is another cause that attracts fungi. For instance, I have seen trees that had been pruned by cutting large limbs off, leaving three or four inches of snags, through the tree. These snags, generally in a short time, decay and create fungus. There are many other causes that attract fungi—plowing too close to fruit-trees, tearing and breaking the roots at different times through the season. With this and bad culture fruit-trees become stunted and diseased. Fruit-trees affected by fungi, either on the limbs or roots, may be effectually cured by close-pruning the roots, and by adding small quantities of well-rotted manure around the roots. This is the treatment for the roots when all the diseased parts of roots are cut off and the head of the tree pruned pretty severe, always being careful, when cutting off a branch, not to leave a snag three or four inches. In cutting off branches they should be cut close to the main stem or branch. These cuts should be neatly smoothed with a sharp knife. I consider that all fruit-trees can be made proof against the fungi by careful pruning, and by not allowing the branches to be crowded. Clean culture is also one of the great secrets in fruit culture; and from several years' observation in various localities in the South, fungus had only affected diseased and uncultivated trees. My mode is to cultivate the orchards once or twice a year, until the trees commence to bear; after this there is but little culture required, only to keep the big weeds and rank grass cut down around the trees.—James Parker, in Our Home Journal.

BEES AND ANTS.—Sir John Lubbock, M. P., who devotes himself a good deal to entomology, has been lecturing on bees and ants to the Natural History Society. His details in regard to bees, the result of prolonged watching, are rather unfavorable to the character of the favorite insects, which he charges especially with selfishness and lack of sympathy for one another. He believes the common opinions as to their devotion to the queen bee to be without foundation. There is a great difference in the degree of their intelligence and great peculiarities with reference to their time of work. He believed bees did hear, though he was never able to make any sound which they were able to recognize. He believed they had a keen sense of smell, and that would account in many cases for the antipathy or otherwise which they are said to have for persons. He found that the warmth or coldness of his body had much to do with their friendliness toward him.

As to ants, his observations entirely confirm the common opinion of their steadiness, perseverance and industry. Then, as to their power of communication, it often happened that an ant which had been put to honey came back from the nest with one friend; sometimes there were more, and in some cases as many as twenty ants returned with the single ant which had gone from the honey to the nest. The manner in which communication of ideas by ants was made was still doubtful, and he had brought the subject forward in the hope that he might induce others to make further and better observations.

HERE is something new in butter. A "lightning churn" has been exhibited, by which a pint of milk is converted into a pound of butter in less than one minute. It is thought that the butter is made "to come," in this singular manner, by a galvanic current produced by the warm water, salt and saltpeter placed within an outer metallic cylinder, which incloses the one in which the milk is placed.

The inventor says that the peculiar composition and preparation of the metal used in the several cylinders of the churn are secrets which will not be made public. It is claimed that, practically working, five pounds of butter can be made out of a gallon of milk; yet as high as seven pounds and three-quarters have been made out of one gallon of pure milk, fresh from the cow. Some objection has been urged against calling the product so obtained butter. It appears to be the result of granulation of all the nutritious particles of the milk in a mass, resembling, in all respects, ordinary butter, from which it cannot be distinguished. It can be manufactured at a cost of about five cents a pound.

DYSPEPSIA,
Loss of Appetite, Sour Stomach, Flatulence, Heartburn, Nausea, Fluttering of the Heart, Fainting Sensations, Sudden Flushes of Heat, Depression of Spirits or Melancholy, Water Brash, and Chronic or Nervous Debility. They are Diuretic, Tonic, Alterative and Stimulant. They perfectly eradicate all Bilious disorders arising from a foul stomach, strengthening the system and regulating the functions of the Liver.
Any one suffering with Weak Nerves, Deranged Liver, Kidney Complaint, Loss of Appetite, Fever and Ague, or any of the diseases or symptoms enumerated above, can be materially benefited and entirely cured by the use of these Bitters.

FOR FEMALES.
It is an established fact that fifty one-half of the females are in bad health; or, in other words, never feel well. Many suffer with inward weakness. They feel languid, devoid of energy, extremely nervous, and have no appetite. To this class the Renovating Bitters are especially recommended. Such patients should resort to the use of these Bitters, the invariable result of which will be a strong and healthy constitution, a disappearance of all nervousness, a good appetite and a perfect restoration to health.
Thousands have testified to the merits of these Bitters. I would strongly advise all suffering with the above-named complaints to try them and be convinced.
Full directions accompany each bottle. Price, $1 per bottle, or six bottles for $5.

Scientific.

IN REMOVING grease spots from clothing with benzole or turpentine, the usual way is to wet the cloth with the detergent and then to rub it with a sponge or the like. This only spreads the grease, and does not remove it. The proper method is given by the Scientific American: Place soft blotting paper beneath and on top of the grease spot, after the latter has been thoroughly saturated with the benzole, then press well. The fat is thus dissolved and absorbed by the paper, and entirely removed from the clothing.

MR. E. EDLUND has published in full his theory that electricity is identical with the luminiferous ether. He first shows that the velocity h, with which the ether particles move, differs from v, the velocity with which this motion is propagated; h depends on the current and increases with it, while v depends on the ratio of the electricity to the density, but is independent of the current. It is the velocity v which Wheatstone, Fizeau and others have attempted to measure. The objection to this theory raised by MM. Roiti and Herweig are due to their overlooking the differences in these velocities.

A WRITER in the Chemical News calls attention to a source of error in mercurial thermometers, which does not appear to be generally known. His thermometer having been placed in a Wurtz tube, so that the column of mercury was entirely surrounded by the vapor of a distilling liquid, was, after some days, noticed to indicate three degrees too little. The discrepancy was found to have been caused by volatilization of the upper surface of the mercury and condensation on the upper part of the tube. By causing the mercury to flow to the end of the tube and back, the condensed portion was gathered up, and the correct temperature indicated.

EARTH BATTERIES.—One of the simplest forms of the galvanic battery is the so-called earth battery, which is in fact but a modification of the original voltaic pile. Dr. Vander Weyde, of the Manufacturer and Builder, gives in an answer to a correspondent a very good description of the manner of constructing one. A large zinc plate is buried in the earth between two copper plates of equal size, placed several inches from it, the surfaces of all being parallel, and the two copper plates are connected for one pole of the battery, while the zinc forms the other. Or a number of smaller plates of copper and zinc alternately are buried in a similar way, the coppers being all connected for one pole, and the zincs for the other, by insulated copper wires, well soldered to each plate. The depth at which the plates are buried is only important so far as to secure that they shall be covered with moist earth. The earth over them may be moistened from time to time with dilute sulphuric acid, or solutions of sulphate of alumina or magnesia, etc. This will cause a stronger action at the expense of a shorter duration of the battery, which must in any case be dug up after awhile, cleansed, repaired, renewed by the substitution of fresh zinc plates for those consumed, etc. The action of the earth battery is like that of a slugle cup or element. Hence quantity but not intensity of current may be obtained from it by increasing the surfaces or multiplying the number of the plates. Intensity is obtained in galvanic batteries by increasing the number of pairs or elements. This requires each element to be isolated, and the position plate of one pair to be connected with the negative of the next, which cannot be done in earth batteries. In general, these batteries have not proved as convenient as other apparatus for producing quantity currents; and they are, according to Dr. Vander Weyde, little used.

KEEP AMMONIA IN THE HOUSE.—No housekeeper should be without a bottle of spirits of ammonia, for, besides its medical value, it is invaluable for household purposes. It is nearly as useful as soap, and its cheapness brings it within the reach of all. Put a teaspoonful of ammonia to a quart of warm soap-suds, dip in a flannel cloth, and wipe off the dust and fly specks, grime and smoke, and see for yourselves how much labor it will save. No scrubbing will be needful. It will cleanse and brighten silver wonderfully; to a pint of hot soap-suds mix a teaspoonful of the spirits, dip in your silver spoons, forks, etc., rub with a brush, and then polish on chamois skin. For washing mirrors and windows it is very desirable; put a few drops of ammonia upon a piece of newspaper and you will readily take off every spot or finger mark on the glass. It will take out grease spots from every fabric; put on the ammonia nearly clear, lay blotting paper over the place and press a hot flat iron on it for a few moments. A few drops in water will clean laces and whiten them as well; also muslins. Then it is a most refreshing agent at the toilet table; a few drops in a basin of water will make a better bath than pure water, and if the skin is oily it will remove all glossiness and disagreeable odors. Added to a foot bath it entirely absorbs all noxious smell so often arising from the feet in warm weather, and nothing is better for cleansing the hair from dandruff and dust. For cleaning hair and nail brushes it is equally as good. Put a teaspoonful of ammonia into one pint of warm water, and shake the brushes through the water. When the brushes look white rinse them in cold water, and put them in the sunshine or in a warm place to dry. The dirtiest brushes will come out of this bath white and clean. For medicinal purposes ammonia is almost unrivaled. For the headache it is a desirable stimulant, and frequent inhaling of its pungent odors will often entirely remove catarrhal cold. There is no better remedy for heartburn and dyspepsia, and the aromatic spirits of ammonia is especially prepared for these troubles. Ten drops of it in a wine glass of water are often a relief. The spirits of ammonia can be taken in the same way, but it is not as palatable.

On Saturday, under the stimulus of an advance of 1-16d. at Liverpool, with sales of 18,000 bales, and of ⅛c. at New York, the market opened with an active demand, and, although factors were more stringent in their pretensions, many of them asking ⅛c. over Friday's figures, yet the movement during the morning exhibited more than usual animation, and by 12 M. 3,500 bales had changed hands, partly at previous rates and the rest at a further improvement of ⅛c., and in some cases of ¼c., after which there were further sales of 7,050 bales, making a total of 10,350, the market closing firm at a net advance of fully ⅛c. At the opening on Monday factors were still more stringent in their pretensions, claiming a further advance of ⅛@¼c., and some few sales were made at ⅛@3-16c. more than could have been realized on Saturday; but after the telegrams reporting a falling off in futures at New York prices lost their buoyancy, and the business for the rest of the day was either at previous rates, or in some cases at slight concessions. The sales embraced 4,500 bales. On Tuesday, with nothing in the dispatches to stimulate the movement, the market opened dull and drooping, and in order to effect sales factors were compelled to make concessions of about ⅛c. The demand, nevertheless, although rather better toward the close, exhibited very little animation, and the sales were confined to 4,350 bales. At the close prices had receded to their position on Friday, and we have consequently no change to make in quotations except a slight variation in middling fair and fair.

The above makes an aggregate for the past three days of 19,200 bales, against 18,650 for the corresponding time last week and 19,200 the week before.

The receipts proper at this port since the first of September, exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas, are 850,493 bales, against 1,000,046 bales to the same date last year, and the decrease in the receipts at all the ports up to the latest mail dates, as compared with last year, is 119,536 bales. The decrease by the reports per telegraph is 140,691—2,962,252 against 3,102,943. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same date last year, there is an increase of 92,506 bales to Great Britain, and a decrease of 43,656 to France and 55,853 to other foreign ports. Advertisers' Directory

OF THE

NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

Alphabetically Arranged Under the Heads of the Business or Articles Advertised.

NOTE.—We take no advertisements except from those who we have good reason to believe are respectable and reliable. The publisher urges his solicitor and agents to seek the advertisements of the most worthy and reliable representatives in every branch of business, and not to apply to or accept business from persons of doubtful character. We have refused business to the extent of thousands of dollars each year for want of satisfactory information in reference to applicants. We think we may safely claim for the list below that it embraces, as a rule, the very best men and firms in the different branches represented.

News of the Week.

DOMESTIC.

WASHINGTON, March 3.—The Louisiana election cases have been decided by the House with very little discussion. Pinchback's claim was rejected, and George A. Sheridan was declared duly elected and was sworn in. Sypher was declared not elected, and Effingham Lawrence was admitted in his stead and took the Ironclad oath. They have each about fifteen hours to serve.

WASHINGTON, March. 4.—The Louisiana arbitration is looked for with great interest by the leading Conservative and Democratic politicians here. Gordon, Lamar, Pendleton and all the party leaders here now approve of it.—Times.

WASHINGTON, March 5.—At no time since inauguration day has there been such a crowd as this morning to witness the opening of the extra session of the Senate and swearing in of the new senators. The weather was disagreeable, and a severe snow storm prevailed, but the ladies were not deterred. The galleries were filled with ladies long before the hour of meeting, and by eleven o'clock it was impossible to obtain standing-room even in the doorways. Upon the floor of the Senate curious visitors were hunting out the seats of Andrew Johnson, General Burnside and other prominent senators who were to be sworn in. Upon the desk of Andrew Johnson, on the Democratic side of the chamber, as well as upon that of Mr. Dawes on the Republican side, were handsome bouquets. When General Burnside entered the chamber he was greeted with a round of applause by the galleries. Andrew Johnson did not make his appearance until after the meeting of the Senate. When he was called up to take the oath he was greeted with applause, which was soon checked by the Vice President.

LITTLE ROCK, March 5.—The Legislature adjourned at noon to-day until the first of November, when it meets for the purpose of arranging the outstanding indebtedness of the State. The House unanimously adopted the resolution presented by Mr. Maxwell (colored,) Republican, declaring that peace and quietude now prevail, and extending a welcome to all immigrants, promising them safety in person and property, and freedom of speech.

NEW YORK, March 7.—Mr. Henry Varley, English evangelist, from London, preached at the Hippodrome this evening to a congregation of about seven thousand people.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 7.—The United States steamer Saranac sailed for Mexican ports to-day. She will call at Acapulco and inquire into the recent outrages on American citizens.

WASHINGTON, March 8.—The following is authorized: Mr. Wheeler received this morning from New Orleans his articles of adjustment, signed by forty-four members of the Conservative caucus, an ample number to secure the desired result. He at once telegraphed to forward by express, to the city of New York, the papers now in the office of the secretary of State which were used in the contested cases before the Returning Board in November last. The referees will meet on Thursday next, at the office of the Hon. William Walter Phelps, in the city of New York, and proceed with the hearing.

NEW YORK, March 8.—The snow storm continued throughout the night; now sunny. A heavy body of snow fell.

Gerritt Smith's widow is dead.

Beecher's church was glutted. The doors were locked at half-past ten. The clamorous crowd continued knocking. Fourteen new members were received.

POUGHKEEPSIE, March, 8.—The snow delays all trains. The fears of a flood are redoubled.

NEW YORK, March 9.—A dispatch from Cape of Good Hope, February 11, says: "The United States steamer Monongahela brings news from the American scientific expedition, located at Kerquelin Land for the purpose of observing the transit of Venus. Their labors in observing the planet's track on the ninth of December were eminently successful. The weather was very favorable, considering the general state of the weather on Desolation Island. The English and French parties stationed there for the same purpose were also successful in observing the phenomenon. Several excellent photographs of the sun at periods of the planet's contact were obtained. All the instruments of the Americans worked with great satisfaction."

BOSTON, March 9, 8 P. M.—Dispatches from New Hampshire up to this hour indicate an unusually large vote by each party, and a possible Republican victory through the prohibition vote, which is very generally being cast for the Republican nominees. The Republicans already claim the Governor and the second and third Congressional districts. The election of Frank Jones, Democratic Congressional candidate in the first district, is conceded by the Republicans.

FOREIGN.

LONDON, March 4.—The steamer Gotteuberg, with eighty-five passengers and thirty-five crew, wrecked near Australia. Only four persons known to be saved. The filled boats are yet to be heard from. The Gottenberg had a large cargo, including three thousand ounces of gold.

Advices from Buenos Ayres state that tumults had occurred, during which the palace of the Catholic archbishop was sacked and the houses of the Jesuits fired.

BERLIN, March 5.—In consequence of the Pope's last encyclical the government introduced in the Prussian Chamber of Deputies a bill withdrawing the State endowment from the Catholic clergy, but provided for the restoration to those who bind themselves to obey the laws.

A decree has been issued by Emperor William forbidding the exportation of horses.

LONDON, March 6.—Advices from Asia Minor state that twenty thousand of a population of fifty-two thousand died from starvation.

ST. JOHN, N. B., March 8.—Forty bodies have been buried temporarily in the snow, which prevents access to the cemeteries.

BERLIN, March 9.—The Tagsblatt, of this city, says the government having been informed that France intended to order an experimental concentration of troops on her eastern frontier early in the spring, intimated to President MacMahon that it would direct the mobilization of two army corps on the Rhine if France resisted in carrying out the intention.

From the Work.

DELHI CIRCUIT.—Mr. Editor: Our first quarterly meeting closed this day, after a continuance of six days. Bro. Carter, our presiding elder, did all the preaching, as usual, and greatly to the satisfaction and edification of the large congregations. We received six persons into the church—five by letter and one on original application. The greater part of the community has been quickened and revived on the subject of religion.

B. F. ALEXANDER, P. C.

MARCH 4, 1875.

MANSFIELD, LA.—Mr. Editor: Owing to circumstances which I could not control, I was late in reaching my appointment. Though my family is not here yet, I have looked into the parsonage.

You have had some glowing accounts in the ADVOCATE of preparations made at other places for the reception of the preachers. Allow me to say now that no people are ahead of the Mansfield people in this line of things. These ladies know exactly how to do it. Why, sir, I could not see a thing that was left to be done in the way of "fixing up." Every want seemed to be anticipated.

Bro. Bradley did a fine work here, and left the church in good condition. With the blessing of God we look forward to another triumph.

Considering the "times upon which we have fallen," the female college is doing well—fifty-two pupils in attendance now. Bro. Armstrong is moving along without much noise, but doing good work with competent assistance.

As I am "eating around," I have been into the dining hall of the college, and therefore take the liberty of saying to persons who are in search of a boarding school for their daughters that the fare is all that could be desired. Will not the Methodists of Louisiana rally to the support of this institution?

Fraternally, J. M. BROWN.

MARCH 4, 1875.

PENSACOLA, FLORIDA.—Mr. Editor: Permit me, through your columns, to say something in reference to the church and the prospects of Methodism in Pensacola.

We arrived in this city on the fifth of January, and found Bro. W. B. Dennis in waiting at the depot to conduct us to his house, where we were kindly and well cared for by himself and noble wife.

On consultation with stewards the prospects for the future were by no means encouraging. The stringency of the money market, the falling off in the timber trade, the failure of a banking house, by which many of the best-paying members lost considerably, and the unfinished and unfurnished condition of the parsonage, rendered the outlook to both people and preacher of a deeper shade than gloomy.

Trusting in God, and earnestly praying for his blessing and direction, the brethren and some true-hearted sisters went to work, and in a short time the parsonage was improved and furnished sufficiently to make us quite comfortable. Nor have their efforts to make the preacher, and especially his wife, feel that they are to be cared for ceased. The unremitting attention of the ladies to our enjoyment is a cause of gratitude and thankfulness to our great Shepherd. May his blessings, like the morning dews, be distilled upon their pathway.

Our first quarterly meeting embraced the twentieth and twenty-first of February, and the first hours' service found our faithful presiding elder, Dr. Cox, at his post. At the close of the morning service on Sunday the interest was such as to encourage the continuance of our efforts, Bros. Cox and Nash rendering all the aid their other duties would allow. We closed on Sunday night following, receiving six into full connection, two others candidates for membership, and two by certificate.

I think a good spirit is pervading the membership, and if properly nourished the final results will be glorious. JOSEPH T. CURRY.

MARCH 1, 1875.

COLUMBIA, LOUISIANA.—Mr. Editor: After serving my allotted time on Rapides circuit Bishop Paine saw fit to transfer me to Columbia circuit. So, after making my arrangements as best I could, I started with wife and three children from Rapides to Columbia, a distance of sixty miles, on the afternoon of Thursday, February 11.

Our conveyance was an uncovered hack, drawn by two horses; with bed, bedding and three trunks as a portion of our load. We stopped the first night with a kind friend, about eight miles from home, and were just in the act of starting early next morning, when a messenger came in great haste for me to go a distance of twelve miles to see his dying sister. I did not know how to refuse, but hurried with him to her bedside. She was calmly trusting in Jesus, but did not seem to have as bright an evidence of her acceptance as she desired. I read, sung, prayed and talked with her till she seemed perfectly willing to live or die.

We made another start on Saturday morning, just in time to travel four miles in a soaking rain. However, we kept nearly dry; stopped at Little river a few hours, but, as the lady of the house was quite indisposed, we had to cross the river in the rain. We could not persuade or force our horses to pull our vehicle into the boat; and after we had pulled it in, and the ferryman pulled us across, our team would not pull us out. So we had to send back for a yoke of oxen to pull us up. We traveled but a few miles before we came to swimming-water, and had to return to White Sulphur Springs and tarry for the night. We traveled about three miles, on the holy Sabbath, to Sister Whatley's, where we remained till Tuesday. Here we felt at home. As it continued to rain we traveled to Bro. Baker's, near Centerville, that day, and halted again. On we trudged, through water and mud, sometimes bogging down, then unloading and prizing out; then loading up and trying again, till we finally reached this place on Thursday, the eighteenth instant—just one week on the route. But the kind people of Columbia had rented for us a comfortable house, and furnished it with many of the necessaries of life, among which were about enough provisions to do us four months.

The weather is still bad, and I, with my two youngest children, am sick with a cold; but I hope soon to be in the work again. We are consecrating ourselves more fully to the Lord, and hope to win many precious souls for the Master.

J. F. WYNN.

FEBRUARY 23, 1875.

A New Presbyterian Church.

DEDICATION CEREMONIES.

At eleven o'clock yesterday the new Presbyterian church at the corner of Franklin and Enterpe streets was dedicated to the service of God. The building has very recently been finished, and, though its dimensions are comparatively small, it is complete in arrangements for the comfort and convenience of the congregation. The church is two stories in height, and with a plan resembling a capital letter, the cross stroke at each end of the perpendicular representing transverse sections, which may be called transepts. The first floor or basement contains several spacious rooms, to be used by the Sunday school department, or as prayer meeting and lecture-rooms. Back of these are various other apartments, such as a library, a kitchen for the accommodation of the Sewing Society; and above, in the eastern transept, a large chamber where the ladies connected with the church may hold their sessions. On the second floor is the nave, with two side aisles. The ceiling is divided into a reticulation of small, slightly colored panels, and in the center of the nave is a chandelier surrounded by a circle of prisms of glass for the better dispersion of the light. And there is also in the ceiling a series of circular ventilators. On each side of the chancel is a small gallery of a quadrantal shape, the space beneath them being formed into vestry-rooms. Opposite to the pulpit is a third gallery extending across the body of the church. In the middle of the left wall is an alcove adapted to the use of the choir, and a similar alcove exists in the rear of the pulpit. The windows are of stained glass, and the jambs run to a point at the head of the arch. At least one thousand five hundred persons can be seated in this church, and the manner of its construction will be found very favorable to the comfort of the congregation. The whole cost of the edifice was about $32,000.—Picayune, March 8.

THE Protestants of Mexico are still enduring persecution. The old hatred will not be given up by the priestly party. A late dispatch states that a Protestant Bible reader has been assassinated in Vista Hermosa. The liberal press demand the punishment of the perpetrators of such outrages hereafter, according to the full rigor of the law. The dispatch adds: "A number of ladies have published cards, declaring that their signatures to the recent protest against the law abolishing convents were obtained under false pretenses. The Pajaro Verde, an Ultramontane journal, has raised a storm of indignation by declaring that only Messalinas and Aspasias among women now belong to the liberal party. Even ladies of the church party protest against the language used."

IN PRUSSIA clerical mustaches are at a discount. From our foreign exchanges we learn that recently the president of the Brandenburg Consistory refused to swear in a young minister because he wore a mustache. The young minister refuses to part with his hair, and the matter is to be carried to a court of justice.

Wonderful Awakening in France.

While we have accounts of revivals from every part of our own land, and fresh intelligence of the great work of grace that is going on in Scotland, Ireland and England, says the New York Observer, we have this week received the tidings of a wonderful religious movement among the Protestants of France. The Spirit has been poured out upon the pastors and people assembled at Nimes, in the south of France, and as they came from Paris and from all parts of the land it is not too much to hope that this is only an earnest of a more general blessing to be enjoyed by the people of the whole country. Every Christian heart will rejoice in the intelligence, and will have fresh hope in praying for France.

The Paris Le Christianisme au XIX Siecle, the journal of the Reformed Church, of the tenth of February, has an article by the excellent Pasteur Doumergue, the son-in-law of the late Dr. Merle D'Aubigne, from which, as translated by the London Record, we give some extracts:

"PARIS, February 10, 1875.

"The meetings which took place at Nimes last week seem destined to mark a very important era in the history and in the life of the Protestantism of that part of France. The people responded to the call that was made to them with the passionate but generous ardor which characterizes Southern populations. Throughout the city the subject was being talked of; the halls became too small for the crowds, and for four days these crowds were praying. For us who were far from these spiritual feasts, and who can only gather the heart-stirring echoes, let us at least listen with an attentive ear, and let us admire the power of the God of miracles. We have received numerous letters, not, it is true, destined for publication, but perhaps their want of pretension will succeed better than a formal article in conveying and kindling the emotions that we should wish to share with our friends.

"The meetings lasted full four days, Tuesday and Friday included. The programme was as follows, after a prayer meeting on the Monday:

"Prayer meeting from 9 to 10.

"General gathering from 10 to 1 P. M.

"General gathering from 2 to 4.

"Meeting for pastors from 4.30 to 6 P. M.

"General gathering at 8 P. M.

"A formidable programme, it will be said. Yet, notwithstanding the concourse was considerable from the beginning, and continued to increase on the Wednesday and Thursday. It was even necessary to double the number of meetings by holding them at the same hours, in two different chapels. The pastors, in number about a hundred, were divided into two groups. The three sorts of meetings were all very interesting. The prayer meetings, says our correspondent, were full of life. Prayers and singing were kept up with animation. Upon the desk of the president there were always found a great many requests for prayer, some very touching. The general gatherings were occupied by singing, prayers and addresses. It was on the Wednesday that the stream, so to speak, began to overflow its banks. A deep earnestness prevailed—a real spiritual hunger and thirst. Women and young people declared by notes that they had found peace. Pastors told how they had watched through the night, reading the Bible and praying, and that the Lord Jesus Christ had answered their prayers. Men of mature age, gray-headed old men, exclaimed, with faces streaming with tears: 'I must renew (de nouveau) consecrate my gray hairs to the Lord.'

"On the Wednesday, at the general gathering at two o'clock, the scene was indeed solemn. The consecration of self to God had been the subject: 'Present your bodies a living sacrifice.' A hymn of consecration had just been sung (préeisement) for the occasion—that of M. Theodore Monod. M. Matthieu Lelievre had prayed, saying to God that the contract between him and us was made, that we were coming, each one of us, to put our signature against it. * * * I can assure you it was most solemn, impressive, holy. How many repeated to God, in all sincerity: 'Yes, yes, my Lord, I consecrate myself to thee, entirely to thee.' And how many of these sincere promises will not God have heard!

"But in order to understand the principle of this revival, it is to the special meetings of pastors that we must look. The first two, exclusively meetings for prayer, were very remarkable. The first was for humiliation—profound, courageous. Several pastors confessed to God, in the presence of their brethren, their want of faith and of life. Others expressed their troubles. The second meeting was already, for many, deliverance and its joys. For myself, I believe in a revival which begins with the pastors, and in a conversion accomplished in hearts softened by repentance. On the last evening the Lord's Supper was administered. Almost the whole assembly communicated.

"The impression produced by all these meetings, and the religious emotion of those who attended, spread throughout the city of Nimes, as was proved on Sunday, the seventh, when M. Monod was to preach at half-past ten. Directly after the conclusion of the first service, which began at eight o'clock, the chapel was refilled. The congregation became at last literally packed one upon another, sitting, standing, wherever there was any space. Many were unable to get in. The auditory was composed of all classes of society. The elite of the Protestant society of Nimes were to be seen there. M. Monod developed the text: 'He is made unto us wisdom, righteousness, sanctification and redemption.' With greater fullness and more energy (elan,) it was still the same clearness of thought, the same simplicity of expression, the same earnestness as at the meetings over which he had presided. His discourse produced the deepest emotion."

Let us conclude the narrative of these blessed days by the following lines from our correspondent:

"What will the meeting at Montauban be? What will be those at Geneva, Lausanne, Neufchatel?—for the Swiss have invited M. Theodore Monod. The impulse has been given. The same profound wants are everywhere felt. This is well. It is the Spirit of God who breathes over the church: 'All power is given unto me in heaven and earth.' Let us hope for great things."

In a postscript to the article Mr. Dommergue mentions another letter which he had received from M. Richard, pastor at Alais, in which the following passage occurs, relating more to the pastors than to the people:

"I never witnessed anything like the meetings which have taken place at Nimes between the first and sixth of February. My thoughts and my heart are so much filled with the benedictions of which I have myself been more than a witness during these memorable days, that it is impossible for me to tell you all, or even to give you an idea of the whole. I have an embarrassment of choice, but that embarrassment is all the greater because God has neither measured nor counted his favors.

"Picture to yourself about a hundred and twenty or a hundred and thirty pastors, placed by the power of the Spirit of God face to face with conscience, with their past ministry, with their vocation, waiting in humility for what God will give them. Never, perhaps, had conscience spoken to them in such accents, and caused them to shed so many blessed tears as in these meetings. Never had their ministry appeared to them so grand and so awful. Never had they so fully measured the distance between what they are and what they ought to be. Never had they felt so far from the end, or so near to him who has attained the end for them, and will attain it in each one of them.

"After each of these days of grace many experienced the need of passing the night in prayer. And when they met together the next day, what holy emotions, what deliverances, what blessings they shared in common! Their prayers were the cries of souls stirred to the depths of their moral being, because, before expressing themselves in words mingled with sobs, they had moved the heart of God. In proportion as they felt their own nothingness and the might of their Savior God, they anew consecrated themselves to him, or rather they let themselves be consecrated by him, abandoning themselves entirely to him. Sometimes a voice would be raised to make, on behalf of those present, a covenant with their divine Master, while each one of them would offer himself to the Redeemer, and make in the depths of his heart this holy covenant. We believe that God approached this church, in the persons of the pastors at Nimes, last week, and that he is about to do great things."

Having thus spoken of the pastors, M. Richard proceeds:

"What shall I say of the crowds that pressed from morning to night within the two chapels of la Rue du Fort and of la Rue Saint Dominique, to hear, not sermons, for no one preached, but the reading of the word of God, accompanied by simple reflections, singing and prayers? These crowds became so considerable that on Thursday they were obliged to open four places of worship at once. Eternity alone will reveal all the good that God has done and will still do by such gatherings."

THE RESULTS OF THE SERVICES.—What has been the result of the meetings held by Messrs. Whittle and Bliss in Louisville? It is too soon to add up the results, but not too soon to say that they are great and gracious. There have been additions to nearly all the churches in the city. There will be a prayer and inquiry meeting every day this week in the Second Presbyterian church. On last Sunday evening four hundred young men stood up in the lower part of the hall to ask for the prayers of God's people, besides those in the gallery who asked for prayer. On last Sunday afternoon the hall was crowded one hour before the time appointed for the meeting. At every meeting there have been numerous requests for prayer, and thanksgiving for mercies received. And the work is not sensational and exciting, but quiet, and, we think, deep and sincere. The time has not come for counting the results, but they will be great and glorious.—Christian Observer, March 3.

TO THE PREACHERS OF THE LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.—The Minutes for 1875 have already been sent forward to all the preachers; but in any case where they may have failed to reach the parties, others will be forwarded at once upon notifying Bro. Harp of this fact.

J. WILKINSON,
Secretary of Conference.

MARCH 1, 1875.

FEAR not the threats of the great, but rather the tears of the poor.

A Grand Commencement.

The commencement exercises of the Medical Department of the University of Nashville and of the Vanderbilt University took place on Thursday night, February 26. The capacious Masonic Hall was crowded with as intellectual an audience as we remember to have seen in Nashville. The Rock City band discoursed excellent music. The Rev. T. A. Hoyt, pastor of the First Presbyterian church, offered an appropriate prayer. Prof. Safford then introduced W. H. Campbell, of Texas, who delivered the valedictory address for the graduating class. He paid a high and well-deserved tribute to the faculty, and spoke in exalted terms of the citizens of Nashville, especially the ladies. He was followed by Dr. Thomas O. Summers, professor of anatomy and histology, in an address to the graduating class on behalf of the faculty. We are too nearly related to the professor to say much about his address, and it is not necessary to do so, as we yield to an earnest request for its publication in our columns. It takes high ground on "The Mission of Medicine." Judge Lea made an excellent address, though brief, to the graduates of the University of Nashville, which we wish we could reproduce. Fifty-nine diplomas were then distributed to those graduates. Bishop McTyeire then delivered a capital, characteristic address to the Vanderbilt graduates—sixty-one in number—and diplomas were delivered to them by Prof. Safford, secretary of the faculty, duly signed and sealed by the president and secretary of the board of trust, and by the dean and secretary of the medical faculty. These young gentlemen have the satisfaction of receiving diplomas bearing the first seal and signatures of the University. Their names are as follows:

H. G. Beard, J. Blakenship, W. V. Bosh, E. A. Brown, A. A. Booth, A. B. Brown, C. S. Briggs, S. H. Bundy, W. H. Campbell, W. M. Claypool, S. W. Champ, H. T. Campbell, G. W. Charlton, J. C. Cassidy, J. E. Dodson, T. S. Evins, W. W. Ellis, R. R. Freeman, R. M. Foster, P. B. Green, R. E. Goodlett, G. B. Gillespie, J. B. E. Gates, J. W. Hunt, W. J. Halcher, G. W. Johnson, R. N. Knox, W. C. Lowery, S. F. Mudlin, J. M. McCaulley, J. M. Moore, J. W. McAlister, H. W. Morgan, J. T. Moore, H. M. Markham, D. C. Overton, F. A. Overall, R. A. Orr, S. M. Paynes, E. J. P. Pool, J. G. Rodgers, J. A. Siddons, R. W. Scott, F. H. Stamp, W. A. Smith, H. B. Sullivan, L. D. Scarborough, B. S. Stone, J. B. Smith, Joel Smith, J. F. Strother, W. H. Taylor, L. L. Thomas, J. I. Taylor, J. M. Townes, W. M. Wherry, T. L. Wilburn, S. B. Wright, A. H. Williams, R. D. Winsett, J. R. Allen.

Then came an exciting scene: Prof. Maddin announced that the students who had contended victoriously for certain medals would come forward and receive them. The doctor made a few suitable and sensible remarks to them, and delivered the medals. They are of gold, beautifully fashioned and duly inscribed. The first, offered by Prof. Summers (anatomy,) was awarded to Charles S. Briggs, of Nashville; the second, by Prof. Briggs, (surgery,) to J. I. Taylor, of Jackson, Tennessee; the third (obstetrics,) by Prof. Menees, to H. B. Sullivan, of Waco, Texas; the fourth (gyneeology,) by Prof. Nichol, to James E. Dodson, Texas; the fifth (materia medica,) by Prof. Atchison, to H. A. Gant, Water Valley, Mississippi. We have reason to know that these spurs were well won, and we guess they will be worthily worn. The interesting exercises were closed by the benediction by the editor of the Christian Advocate.—Nashville Christian Advocate.

Correction.

MR. EDITOR: Your last ADVOCATE (March 4) contains an article from Rev. C. F. Gillaspie, presiding elder of the Seashore district, Mississippi Conference, in which this sentence appears (and, as I think, incorrectly as to the facts in the case, as far as I am concerned:) "The preachers appointed to Ocean Springs station and Handsboro mission having failed to take charge of their works," etc. (italics mine.) No doubt, without Bro. Gillaspie intending to do so, it casts a reflection upon my ministerial character unless an explanation is given to the uninformed. I was appointed by Bishop Paine, at the last session of the Mississippi Conference, in charge of Ocean Springs station. The first Sabbath after Conference I took charge of the work by filling the pulpit morning and night, and up to Saturday, January 30, I continued my ministrations each Sabbath, save the time I was absent making arrangements to move my household effects from my last appointment, near Port Hudson, Louisiana. I was en route to fill my appointment January 31, when I received a letter from Bro. Parks, steward at Ocean Springs, containing a copy of a letter from Bishop Paine to Bro. Parks, saying I "was transferred to the Louisiana Conference and stationed at Cadiz Street church, New Orleans." I at once obeyed orders, and on January 31 took charge of the new appointment, where I have been at work ever since. ROBERT B. DOWNER.

P. S.—My postoffice address is New Orleans, Louisiana, care R. J. Harp, 112 Camp street.

THURSDAY, MARCH 11, 1875.

BEHOLD, I KNOCK!

FROM THE GERMAN.

Behold, I knock! 'Tis piercing cold abroad
This bitter winter-time;
The ice upon the dark lakes has not thawed,
The earth is white with rime;
O human hearts! are ye all frozen too,
That at closed doors I vainly call to you?
Is there no one who open to his Lord?
Behold, I knock!

Behold, I knock! The evening shadows lie
So peaceful near and far;
Earth's carpet—neat in yonder cloudless sky
Glimmers the evening star;
'Tis in such holy twilight time that oft
Full many a stony heart hath waxed soft;
Like Nicodemus, in the dark-drawn night,
Behold, I knock!

Behold, I knock! O soul, art thou at home,
For thy Beloved's here?
Has't thou made ready flowers ere he should come?
Is thy lamp burning clear?
Know'st thou how such a Friend received should be?
Art thou in bridal garments dressed for me?
Decked with thy jewels as for guests most dear?
Behold, I knock!

Behold, I knock! Say not: "'Tis zephyr mild
Which rustles the dead leaf;"
It be thy Savior, 'tis thy God, my child,
Let not thine ear be deaf;
If I come now in breezes soft and warm,
I may return again upon the storm:
'Tis no light fancy—Grim be thy belief;
Behold, I knock!

Behold, I knock! As yet I am thy guest,
Waiting without for thee;
The One shall come when, homeless and distressed,
Thou, soul, shalt knock for me;
To those who heard my voice ere 'twas too late,
I open, in that hour, my peaceful gate;
To those who scorned, a closed door it will be:
Behold, I knock!

Consecration.

MR. EDITOR: The Apostle Paul, guided by the Holy Spirit, in the opening of the twelfth chapter of Romans announces the doctrine of entire consecration in concise terms, and asserts its absolute and binding force upon every child of God. The apostle says: "Your bodies." That includes all. No loophole is found for the excuse-maker. Was there ever a man who separated himself from his body, or who did not place his body in the center of his chief good? Let a man consecrate his body—not in form, but in a living way—and everything follows the doing this.

A man who thus consecrates himself to God will feel at ease in regard to the State, the Church, his family, his personal wants—has salvation, for he will feel that being God's assures him of all that his Father has promised him. Can there be completeness of Christian character and this distinctive act be unperformed? Without it there is lacking direct personal evidence of God's goodness, our acceptance by him, and the comforting testimony of his perfect will being the true object of our aim. Our sacrifice is not living, for it wants blood, the evidence of life. The spirit of true holiness is absent, and God spurns our offering as he did Cain's.

It is only when the soul groups together its manifold wants, and, clearly seeing its incapacity to satisfy them, turns with all its strength, both of will and longing, to God, that sunlight dispels the cloud of want, and full supply takes the place of destitution. The trouble, however, is that we do not wish to acknowledge our poverty or admit our inability to meet every contingency of life.

A terse writer has said that "a whole man, in any true sense, is a holy one," and Paul clearly means this in the passage referred to. The sacrifice, to be acceptable, must be a whole one—no keeping back of any part. Mental reservation is unknown in the philosophy of the Bible, and the sooner we learn this truth the faster will our progress be in the way of holiness.

What a doctrine is not shows us what it is. Now this consecration is not professing to love God with all the soul and mind, and showing a total disregard of the command to keep holy the Sabbath; for he that dishonors the law does not surely honor the law-giver. The soul that entertains bitter hatred, is ever fault-finding, sees monstrous beams in the eyes of others, indulges in harsh criticism, and admits no good in others, surely has not passed through the tough hide of self, and become lost in another self—the embodiment of love. To be hid with Christ is to be a stranger to all these elements of evil. To pretend to this living consecration, and yet in the face of Jesus to fix the limit we are disposed to extend it, is but a dead form, without one pulsation of true consecrated life. It is not to enter the family of God, and violate every important rule of the household; nor is it fixing, on our part, the amount or kind of work we will do, as a common, interested member of the family; nor the holding back of means given us to be used for the advancement of the King's cause, the using of which is the test of our fealty to him. There is but one standard of true membership, and that has been given by the Head of the house, and we are bastards, and not sons, if we alter it. The layman who halts in his fealty, or the pastor who shrinks from a full surrender of his predilections, is below the standard. Shall we judge them? God forbid. Judgment is the King's prerogative.

But there are some practical lessons which this truth contains that are ignored. In our day the State, the Church, and necessarily individuals, are suffering under the hot chastisement surging over us, and whose waves threaten to founder our bark of hope. The suffering mass turn with heavy heart and tearful eye in quest of some ray of sunshine to relieve the somber look of things. Not a wandering meteor of hope, however, flecks the horizon—the gloom thickens, the heart sickens, and the soul is tossed on the ocean of anguish. "There is no eye to pity, no arm to save," is the common remark. Stop! Has the sleepless Eye lost its power to perceive, or the strong Arm its power to sustain? Not so. The reason for all this is that the altar of consecration has upon it not a living sacrifice, but a motley offering, and its blemishes offend the King. God is not in deed and in truth our refuge. We are trusting to our own ropes of sand; we are unwilling to repent of our own sins, overlooking the fact that by so doing we secure the sure aid of him who at one touch is able to cure our torment. We are not whole and entire in our consecration, and will never reach that holy state until we consent to descend into the lowest form of contrition. Judgment, in the full robes of wrath, hung over Nineveh; but ashes and sackcloth, confession and repentance, stayed the judgment, and mercy's dove-like wing overshadowed the city. Were the holy leaven of consecration working in the hearts of the hundreds of thousands in these suffering States of the South, were the altars crowned with offerings acceptable to God, just as sure as he is King would the hand of violence become palsied, and the misrule of the wicked end. God is not asleep, nor deaf, nor powerless. No; but he will not succor unless the distressed plead with him for help, nor will he help those who half trust him. The trust must be entire.

Brethren, the kingdom of Jesus is unlike this world, and to be a true member of his kingdom demands of us that we be unlike the subjects of this world. Bitterness and hatred must be excluded; improper distinctions and uncharitable criticism find no place in us; unbelief must give place to a fixed trust in God as a living, acting sovereign; our actions must harmonize with the teachings of Jesus, though the flesh suffer, and our words must breathe the spirit of the Savior, and our lives, our minds and souls be laid on the altar of sacrifice, consecrated to him. Let us go to Olivet's top, and there in the secluded garden learn the lesson of consecration. Look at the Sufferer, holy and without sin! See the hot tears of agony as they fall and kiss the earth he made; hear the sigh of deep distress from that sorrowful soul; behold the crimson drops forcing their way through the pores of his grief-stricken body; hear the words of humble intercession for a perfect consecration to a father's will; and as we read and ponder let us strive to reach up to the full measure of this act, and understand that it was all endured for enemies. Here was true consecration. The burden to be borne was very heavy, the pain to be suffered we cannot conceive; the issue at stake, who can estimate? And alone, this our example, in the gloom of night, deserted by friends and with enemies in hot pursuit, looked up to One ever mighty to save, and found strength for the burden, balm for the pain, and ample resources to meet the issue. Legions of angels stood on the battlements of the city, with poised wings, to rescue the loved one at the utterance of a word; but unfaltering trust in God was better than cohorts of angels, and that trust secured the victory. May the lesson be profitable to us. As Christians, having the high dignity of co-workers with God in harmonizing this ruined world, let us not put our hope of escape from the evil of the times in Congressional committees, in a return to the political teachings of the fathers, nor in any of the nostrums of the day; but rather let us put to silence the scoffs of the so-called wise men of the age by prayer and supplication, and a true consecration of all we possess to him who rules not only in heaven, but upon earth also. Man's extremity is God's opportunity. We suffer; but are we not sinning? We are in much tribulation; can man succor? We are taught by years of judgment lessons that time cannot efface, and all our efforts to meet the storm of fire have proved but smoking flax. Let us be willing, therefore, to give our heavenly Father opportunity to bring us social, political and spiritual salvation. A week of humiliation, prayer and true consecration for life, with unlimited trust in God, will open our way from present dangers, and if persisted in will keep far from us future evils.

"The Two Methodisms in Kentucky."

MR. EDITOR: Be it far from me to even desire to lay aside the sacred livery of my high calling of God for the fanciful ermine of the latter-day politician. I would not touch the putrid garment with a yard-stick. But there is a point beyond which forbearance ceases to be a virtue, and that climax was reached in the state of our feelings on reading an article, in the New York Methodist, of February 20, under the above caption, and signed "Occasional Correspondent." He says:

"From a conservative position on the subject of slavery the Church South became the defender of the institution before the war, and we think clings to the right and propriety of enslaving our colored population now. She has never given up her cherished theory on that subject, and we believe many entertain a hope of seeing the 'peculiar institution,' in some way or other, re-established in the South."

Now we desire to call attention to the charges brought against the Church South in the above quotation:

First, he says that "she" became "the defender of slavery before the war." In one sense this charge is correct; in another it is false. That "she" was a part of the defenders of slavery is true, but that she was "the defender" of said institution is false; for other churches of as extended influence as "she" were equally as strong and unyielding advocates of the institution of slavery; and that they were all honest in their convictions of right will not be questioned by any but inflated bigots, destitute alike of acumen and the governing principles of Christianity. That the Church South still desires slavery, because she once did, is equally false. The hypothesis of Scripture revelation, as well as the experience of all men, demonstrate that our opinions are liable to and do change in regard to what we may at one time think fixed principles. As one has truthfully said: "He who never changes his opinions never corrects any of his faults."

But, leaving the dead to bury their dead, let us come to the living present. He says: The Church South clings to the right and propriety of enslaving our colored population now. We would ask, Mr. "Occasional," of Kentucky, what guaranteed to the Church South her right to own slaves? The constitution of the United States. Then what deprived her of said right? The same constitution, revised and adopted by the people of said United States. Now, as the feeling of her slaves was a constitutional act, any claim on her part to the right to enslave them would of necessity be a claim to a right to trample the constitution under which she lives and is protected. We defy him to present a single utterance or act of said Church South that would lead an intelligent man to the conclusion that she held any such legal views, and until he does do it we must regard him as a calumniator of over eight hundred thousand professing Christians.

As to said Church South holding to the "propriety" of re-enslaving the colored race, we denounce the assertion as false. So far from such being the state of feeling among us, if the subject was brought before our people at the ballot-box I would not be afraid to stake my existence that they would vote it down.

He then adds: "Hence opposition to special efforts to educate the negro and give him a chance in the struggle of life." Wherein, sir, has the Church South offered such opposition? Did she not give them a solid church organization, with property sufficient as a nucleus, and her Christian honor to throw around them her fostering care, as a fond mother shields the infant on her bosom? Has she in word or act done anything to lead them to believe she will not remain true to her pledges? Wherein have we failed to prove us true friends to the interests of the colored man as the self styled friends of the Northern Church? Where, sir, in all your hundreds of thousands of colored members in the United States, is there a colored Bishop to preside over an Annual Conference, or represent the interests of his race in your College of Bishops?

It will not suffice for you of the North to say: If they will elect a Bishop we will receive him as president of our Conferences in the United States. You know full well that they can never command the requisite vote. And we of the Church South know full well, from this and other circumstances, that it is not from a love of the colored man, as such, that the Church North professes such friendship for him. The underlying current comes to the surface, and we see the outcroppings of another and less commendable ultimatum.

Sir, until you of the Church North practice what you preach, and show to us your faith by your works, we of the South can with propriety say: "First cast the beam out of thine own eye, and then shalt thou see clearly to cast the mote out of ours."

MEMNON.

HAZLEHURST, Miss., Feb. 24, 1875.

HE SAID, Bring them hither to me.—Matthew xiv, 18.

The cause of missions should be the cause of the church of God. Hitherto the church in our country has greatly neglected it, but now there seems to be some awakening upon the subject, especially in the Methodist Episcopal Church South. May a deep and abiding interest be aroused, and may it spread forth among all the people of God, that they may, with energy and power, fully address themselves to the glorious task of bearing the gospel into all the world

"Till earth's remotest nation
Has learned Messiah's name!"

The occasion, of which the text is part of the account, was one of remarkable interest. The Lord Jesus Christ was there, in a desert place, and a vast multitude of people—"about five thousand men, besides women and children"—was about him. They were weary and hungry. He felt compassion for them. The disciples thought and said the people ought to be sent into the villages to buy themselves victuals. He saw not as they did. He said: "They need not depart; give ye them to eat." They said: "We have here but five loaves and two fishes." He said: "Bring them hither to me. The people were commanded to sit down; he took the loaves and fishes, and, looking up to heaven, he blessed and brake and gave to his disciples, and the disciples to the multitude. And they did all eat, and were filled." Now let us make a spiritual use of these things. Why not? Is there any law against it? None that I know of.

What is the condition of the vast multitude of earth's inhabitants? Ah! they are hungry; yea, they are faint, and they are dying.

You must do your part toward feeding them. You have a few loaves and fishes. But how can they feed so many? Only in one way. Hear it. Believe it. Bring them to the Master. Yes, bring your offerings unto the Lord. They may be meager, and in your eyes almost worthless. Nevertheless, bring them to him. Bring your prayers. Do you daily pray for missions? Bring your means. Do you pay what you should to the cause of missions? In this Southern, downtrodden land money, you sometimes say, is scarce and hard to get, but you usually have enough for many other purposes, some of which are vain and evil. Why not have some, yes, all you possibly can, by making sacrifices, for this great and glorious cause. Bring your money to the Master. Such was the confidence of the disciples that they brought all their loaves and fishes to Jesus. Can you not have faith enough to bring much if not all of your means, and lay it at his holy feet? Ah! here is the great fault of God's people: They have not the faith in Christ that they should have. We are afraid to trust him who said: "Give, and it shall be given to you, good measure, pressed down, shaken together and running over."

After all, the Master's co-operation is strictly necessary to success. He will not refuse this. It is his cause, and he is constantly engaged in promoting it. He will prepare the people before you; he will take your loaves and fishes; he will look up to heaven and bless them; and he will distribute the loaves and fishes among the disciples for the people. The Master will do more than all others in this glorious mission work. He will find missionaries to carry forth the loaves and fishes if you will furnish them.

Now, having understood the condition of the people, and your duty to contribute for their relief, and that Jesus will always readily aid and cooperate with you, you must appreciate and discharge one more great duty: Receiving loaves and fishes at the holy hands of the Master, you must feed the people. Jesus fed none but the disciples, and they fed the people, according to the sacred history. Then feel your responsibility, ye ministers of the grace of God. Study well and understand your exalted and honorable position. Go forth among the people; carry the consecrated loaves and fishes; give them to every one. Let there be a feast, grand, glorious and divine. With this beautiful prospect before you—the prospect of the world's millions all feasting together in the presence of the blessed Master on the consecrated riches of his love. O why do you so often neglect to hear him say in reference to your loaves and fishes: "Bring them hither to me."

Brethren, make the proper application of these things. W. S. T.

Turning the Battle to the Gate.

The most recent literature of the alleged "conflict between science and religion" shows conclusively that the attacking scientists are being rapidly forced to the defensive. Prof. Tyndall "rises to explain" that the paganism of his famous address was due to a fit of the blues, and that atheism is only the resort of shallow minds. Mr. Huxley finds it convenient to declare that, notwithstanding all his glorifications of matter and materialism, he is "no materialist, but, on the contrary, believes materialism to involve grave philosophical error." John Stuart Mill's posthumous volume on religion staggers his own disciples with its constrained tributes to Jesus Christ, and to the absolute necessity of recognizing and regulating the religious side of human nature.

And now Christian scientists and philosophers who have patiently sounded the depths, and measured the height and length and breadth of the materialistic theories of the time, have assumed the offensive, and from many different quarters have combined against the common foe. Like their challengers, they are using the press, the platform, the professorial chair, and meet them upon their own ground. Large and cultivated audiences greet the eminent lecturers who, like Principal Dawson in his recent course in this city, and President McCosh and Chancellor Crosby, and others who might be named, have subjected the anti-Christian hypothesis to the severest tests of logic and of science, and upon their own grounds have proved them to be philosophically incorrect, and therefore unworthy of credence in their arguments against the Bible.

Dr. Dawson, who is the foremost American opponent of these theories, and ranks very high among scientific writers, has shown in his lectures that genuine science is reacting against the dogmatic intolerance of the philosophers quite as much as it does against that of certain classes of theologians. And he is but one of a corps of first-class men in Europe and in this country who are equally at home in religious and scientific fields of research, and whose learning enables them first carefully and candidly to examine the ground, and then to expose the sophistries and assumptions of these hasty assailants of Christianity. Mr. Huxley's doctrine of protoplasm has been riddled by such men as Lionel S. Beale, and especially to Dr. Hutchison Stirling, of whose work Sir John Herschel, the astronomer, says: "Anything more complete and final in the way of refutation than this essay I cannot well imagine." On every field where these Philistines have flung out their challenges they have been met by men who are, at the least, their equals in learning and their superiors in argument; and while the clangor of battle still keeps up, it probably indicates a shifting of forces and a change of tactics. Thus, as Isaiah says, the Lord of hosts is "for strength to them that turn the battle to the gate."

In the excitement of a first attack upon some new point of the defenses of Christianity there is naturally a popular ferment and an indiscriminate rush to arms, and every one who can seize a weapon feels entitled to strike a blow. Afterward there is a marshaling of organized forces and a more extended warfare, which brings the leaders to the front, and then the contest centers at the citadel where only the most skillful generalship hems in the foe and carries the day. This has been the uniform process in all the great controversies of Christianity with its enemies; and so it will continue to be until the last victory is won. For that victory, and all that must precede it, God will prepare the men and the means. When Paul preached in the temple "all Jerusalem was in an uproar," and when, between the fierce dissensions of Pharisees and Sadducees, he was in danger of being "pulled in pieces of them," the chief captain sent him to the castle under a guard of Roman soldiers, "and the night following the Lord stood by him and said, Be of good cheer, Paul, for as thou hast testified of me in Jerusalem, so must thou also bear witness at Rome." The scenes shifted, but the battle went on in Rome as at Jerusalem; and though the apostle became the martyr there, yet history tells us how the empire became Christian, and how the gospel triumphed.—Christian Intelligencer.

Obituaries.

DIED, at his residence in Bolivar county, Mississippi, February 22, A. D. 1875, LAWRENCE T. WADE. Bro. Wade was born in the State of Tennessee, A. D. 1819. When quite young he moved with his father to Jefferson county, Mississippi. He went from Jefferson county to Carroll parish, Louisiana, where he remained for several years. In the year A. D. 1871 he moved to Bolivar county, Mississippi. He was received into full connection with the Methodist Episcopal Church South in the year A. D. 1853, where he remained a useful and acceptable member till called to join the church triumphant. For many years he served the church in the capacity of steward, where he was always very efficient. He was always ready to respond liberally with his money to every call of the church. He lived a plain, unassuming life, but was always found to be a man of more than ordinarily good judgment. He was full of public spirit, kind and hospitable to all. To know Lawrence Wade was to love him. While with his family, early on Saturday morning, he seemed to be in better health, and more cheerful than usual. He left home to attend to some matters of business, and was soon brought back in a state of unconsciousness. He had been stricken down with apoplexy. He leaves many friends, a widow and four children to weep over his death; but "they weep not as they that have no hope." Q. A. OATS.

LEFT this "vale of tears," to live with Jesus, on the sixteenth of last November, our darling little boy, MARVIN GRAY, aged five summers. He is now realizing the wish expressed in the verse he sang a few days previous to his death:

"I want to be with Jesus,
And with the angels stand,
A crown upon my forehead,
A harp within my hand."

Marvin was truly a lovely child, with more than ordinary talent. His greatest ambition was to become a preacher. The Sabbath evenings, after returning from church, he would usually spend in his child-like way of preaching and praying. "Precious one," we do not forget thee! No. We miss thee; so often we miss thy little form bending and saying: "I lay me down to sleep." We miss thy bright and laughing eyes, thy prattling voice, to us so sweet. We cannot hear our little boy asking us about the beauties of heaven. Could we hear thee now speak from thy bright abode it would be: "Papa and mamma, steer this way." May God help us to steer our little bark over life's tempestuous sea, and land safely on Eden's shore, where we will be with Jesus and our dear little Marvin, and "loved ones that have gone before, to join the angel choir in praise to him who redeemed us."

MAMMA AND PAPA.

JEFFERSON, Texas, Feb. 23, 1875.

DIED, at his residence in Madison county, Mississippi, on the 15th of February, 1875, Mr. ALFRED M. LOCKE, who had just entered on his fifty-second year. He joined the Methodist Episcopal Church South in 1853, during a revival at a place then called Old Prospect, and ever since has been a consistent member of our church, and for many years was a steward of the Camden circuit. His death was sudden and unexpected. He had for a few days complained of pains in the head. The family thought it the effects of a slight cold, but it proved to be fatal. A short time before he died he was cheerful, and said he felt much better, but shortly afterward died before any assistance could be rendered.

I had a personal acquaintance with Bro. Locke for two years, and must say I have met with few better men. He took great interest in the church to which he belonged. As a Sunday school teacher he was punctual and efficient. He was liberal in supporting the church in every respect, and was a man of strict integrity—honest and upright in his dealings with his fellow-men. Therefore he was greatly respected in the community where he lived. Though the day was very cold, yet a large number of people attended his funeral. I believe Bro. Locke died without having an enemy.

The family is bereft of a kind husband and father. The church has lost a pillar. God grant that this affliction may work out for good, both to the church and community.

RALPH BRADLEY, P. C.

THE subject of this notice, WILLIAM T. BURGES, was born September 3, 1859, and departed this life January 10, 1875.

William T. Burges was first afflicted with a diseased leg in the fall of 1873, and in March, 1874, his limb was amputated. For some time he appeared to get better, and his leg healed up; he began to improve in health, but again the fond hopes of the parents were blighted by the appearance of the same disease in the head, which soon prostrated him on his bed, where he remained until his death. During his affliction I was sent for to hold prayer by his bed, and to sing for him, which I did, and also to read many precious promises found in the gospel of Christ, which he listened to with attention. Although his suffering was great, yet he was very much concerned about his salvation, and asked the prayers of the people and minister. In a short time I commenced a protracted meeting at Pine Grove church, near Bro. Burges' residence, and his afflicted boy again sent a request to the ministers and members to pray for him. We all did so. With much earnestness and vehemence, he sent for me, on Sunday, to come and receive him into the church and administer the sacrament to him, which I did in the presence of a large assemblage of people. While we sung the two hundred and ninety-ninth hymn,

Jesus, we thus obey
Thy last and kindest word;
Here, in thine own appointed way,
We come to meet our Lord,

the congregation was melted to tears, and many were heard to shout the praises of God; while the afflicted boy told us that God, for Christ's sake, had pardoned his sins, and he could trust God with a faithful heart for the salvation of his soul.

JOHN H. EVANS.

ALEXANDER BROWN was born near Glasgow, Scotland, February 16, 1790. In his fourth year his parents emigrated to America, and settled first in Richmond county, North Carolina; afterward in Anson county, same State. Here, in 1816, he gave his heart to God and joined the Methodist Church. He moved to Macon county, Alabama, in 1833; thence to Choctaw county, same State, in 1852. He was married to Miss Catherine R. Sikes, of Macon county, Alabama, in 1845, and died April 23, 1874, aged eighty-four years, two months and seventeen days.

Bro. Brown was a man of great worth—an humble, earnest follower of Jesus. Of him it could be truly said: "He walked in his integrity." He was a Methodist after the primitive order. His conceptions of Christian duty were clear and scriptural. The Bible was his daily delight. He read the church papers; was well posted in Methodistic literature; contributed cheerfully and liberally of his means to the cause of missions and other collections ordered by the church of his choice. He loved the class meeting, and was for a number of years class-leader, Sunday school superintendent and steward. In all these responsible relations he was efficient. In all his spheres of action he was most exemplary; socially, cheerful and bright; as a friend, firm and faithful; as a husband, loving the wife as Christ loved the church; as a father, kind and tender, ever remembering the apostolic injunction: "And ye fathers, provoke not your children to wrath, but bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord." His summons came suddenly; but with him all was well. To him death had no terrors. "Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright; for the end of that man is peace."

PUSOMATAHA, Alabama.

JOHN BROWN was born in Richmond county, North Carolina, April 4, 1800; was married to Miss Isabella Wilkerson, of Anson county, same State, in 1820, and at this period united with the Methodist Church; moved to Alabama in 1835, and settled first in Macon county; thence, in 1855, to Choctaw county; in 1857 he moved to Clarke county, Mississippi, and in 1873 back to Choctaw county, Alabama, where he departed this life, July 28, of the same year, aged seventy-three years, three months and twenty-four days.

In the life of this aged brother the simplicity, power and beauty of our holy religion was forcibly exhibited. For fifty-three years he followed in the steps of Jesus. His devotion and love to the church was strong and unshaken to the last. He experienced daily the joys of heartfelt religion. With him religion was divine reality. He could say in truth: "I know that my Redeemer liveth." For several years previous to his death he was an invalid. He bore his great suffering with the utmost resignation. He felt assured that death with him was rapidly approaching, yet no fear agitated his breast. Tranquilly he looked forward to his approaching end. A few weeks before his death I had the pleasure of meeting him in class meeting. He bore witness to the truth of the love of God shed abroad in his heart by the Holy Ghost—spoke confidently of his home beyond the skies. On his death-bed he was conscious to the last. When asked how he felt he answered: "I feel God precious to my soul." In answer to the question, "Do you feel your way clear?" he responded: "O yes." When speech was gone, by sign he gave assurance of triumph. "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his."

INTRODUCTION OF THE MOURNERS' BENCH.—Father Boehm, who is now nearly a hundred years old, speaking of a great revival which took place in Baltimore during the Methodist Episcopal General Conference of 1800, says:

"Dr. Chandler, a famous worker of that day, was the first I knew to adopt the plan of inviting seekers to the mourners' bench. I was engaged in the work when this was done. It was a great advantage, because, with the seekers scattered all through the house, it was difficult to give them suitable attention. By bringing them together they were accessible to those who desired to instruct and encourage them. In the early part of the revival I saw twelve men kneel at the mourners' bench, and they were all quickly converted. One of them was Laurence Laurenson, many years an able minister of the Philadelphia Conference." Referring to these times he further remarks: "People frequently fell as if pierced through the head with a bullet. I have seen strong men, in attempting to go out of the meeting, fall as if slain in battle. So pervasive and mighty was the work that persons would fall prostrate while walking on the street. At times the excitement threatened to break up the business of the Conference. It swept over the city, and many were saved." For the above we are indebted to sketches in the Methodist.

A MOST extraordinary discovery as to the germinating power of seeds is said recently to have been made at the ancient Laurium silver mines near Athens. Here there is a very thick accumulation of slag, at least fifteen centuries old, which is now gradually being smelted in order to extract the silver which it still contains. On the ground which has been uncovered in this process a plant named Glaucium serpieri, belonging to the poppy order and known to the ancient world, has sprung up and flourishes, and its seeds are believed to have lain dormant beneath the silver slag for fifteen hundred if not two thousand years, until the life within them was stirred by their recent exposure to the sun's heat and light.

A WINTER STUDY.

BY ALFRED B. STREET.

The naked branches show the abandoned nest
That poured each music through the flashing dawn
And melting sunset. In yon hammock swung
The gold-back oriole; in this cradle rocked
The robin's little ones, while he launched out
His ravuras from the canted apple-tree
In the green orchard; at that hanging hut
The blithe wren chattered, and from yonder field
The bobolink ran through his bell-like tones,
While he with glitterings kindled up the grass,
Or lighted the fence, or lipped with tawny flame
The chimney of some mullein-stalk. O June!
How beautiful thy glances through thy vail
Of roses, with thy garments starred with blooms,
And sandals printing the glad grounds with flowers!

Yet not more glorious than the crystal white
And lustrous gold of winter, when the cold
Makes the air sparkle, and the blood glow warm,
And the breath curdle. On the frozen hills
The pine looks out, and though its upper fringe
Is dipped in rosy radiance of the west,
Yet knows he, from the softening of the air,
That the gray snow-storm soon will flutter wild
Over all his bleak domain, and crag and chasm
Hide in white blindness. Thou art stern indeed,
O Winter, in thy jolly solitudes,
The wolf and eagle shrink in clefts and tops
Of sheltering boughs, and through the long, black night
Watch the slow stars draw up day's lingering wheel;
But in the valleys, as the snow streams down,
Gay children shout to hail the merry hours
When they can guide the sled and urge the skate,
And feel a warmer fire within their frames
Than the red bannery hearth. Hail Winter we,
The welcome sleep of Nature! so when Spring
Fills woods with violets, melts the chains from rills,
And brings the birds again, with joy renewed,
From contrast we may see her smiling eyes,
And scent the fragrance of her balmy breath.

Frequent Ministerial Changes.

Changes in the pastoral relation do not always prove that ministers are restless, ambitious or past "the dead line" of middle life. Long pastorates are not always desirable for ministers or people. Some wise old men have regarded their life-long settlements as the mistakes of their lives, at least so far as it involved stimulus to study, freshness of spirit and power for good. Good men have outlived their usefulness and have passed years of depressing grief among their people, which might have been avoided by timely changes of relation. No man has a right to make himself an incubus upon a church.

But the balance should be evenly poised in weighing these delicate matters. Congregations are sometimes fickle, indifferent, litigious and dissatisfied. Busy-bodies are at work; rumors fly! Diotrephes aspires to power; "Alexander, the coppersmith," does "much harm." The people are stirred up against the faithful preacher, and cry out: Away with him!

It is amazing how easily ministers may be unsettled by mischief-makers and for the smallest reasons. In a region of country within a radius of fifteen miles from a certain little city, there were fifty-six ministers in sixteen Reformed and Presbyterian churches within a period of only fourteen years. Of these ministers twenty-four were virtually driven away. Some of them were the very best of men and preachers of their class. What stability or prosperity can churches expect under such a system of perpetual and often violent change? One most trying case, among those referred to, was that in which a congregation of ample means demanded the dissolution of the pastoral relation because they could not pay the salary, and the deficiency was between thirty and forty dollars a year! Some subscribers repudiated their pledges and others were unwilling to make up what they would not pay. Not one charge was laid against the faithful pastor whom these faithless people were ready to sacrifice to their own meanness and quarrels. But they did not succeed in the first. The classis rebuked them and the pastor remained until Providence opened the door for his voluntary removal to another charge.

Few ministers get large salaries; most of them receive scarcely what the average of their people live upon. They may get a mere pittance, not equal to the wages of skilled artisans or mechanics. We once knew a middle-aged country minister, now deceased, who used to labor in the harvest-field for his own parishioners, and took his pay in fodder for his horse and cow! This was an extreme case, but even this should not have happened among the farmers to whom he preached the gospel. In another case in a large city, in a period of financial depression, the pastor's salary was made to bear the burden of deduction of hundreds of dollars, which, distributed pro rata among his people, would have amounted to a mere pittance for each pew-holder, some of whom were independently wealthy, while others had suffered by the hard times. These cases suffice to illustrate the many in which inadequate support and parsimonious meanness have sooner or later compelled the separation of pastor and people.

A writer in the Southern Presbyterian Review, in an able article on "The Law of the Tithe and of the Free-Will Offering," says:

"The government statistics for 1871 may well cause every honorable man to hang his head with shame and may well fill every patriot's heart with alarm. They are as follows. Let them be pondered by every lover of his country.

Salaries of all ministers of the gospel	$6,000,000
Cost of dogs	10,000,000
Support of criminals	12,000,000
Cost of litigation	35,000,000
Cost of tobacco and cigars	600,000,000
Consumption of liquor	900,000,000
Support of grog shops	1,500,000,000
Whole cost of liquor	2,200,000,000

"And these are the facts in this 'enlightened' nineteenth century and this United States! One might infer from them that we are fast becoming, if not already, a nation of drunkards. And then consider this country's estimate of the gospel ministry, the ministers of all denominations getting a sum less by millions than the very dogs of the land!"

The remedies for this state of things are chiefly these: higher and scriptural views of the ministry and of the church; better financial management by church officers, and keeping a good conscience toward God and men, by churches and pastors. The habit of systematic and proportionate contribution in weekly or monthly payments, as it is now successfully practiced in many churches, has enabled them to overcome difficulties that have seemed to be insuperable, to pay old debts and keep clear of new ones; to increase salaries and benevolent contributions, to pay sexton, chorister and pastor monthly, and bills for current expenses as they accrue; and, above all, so to distribute the burden of church support among all classes of the people as to make it light and easy.

We have indicated those classes of reasons for the brief tenure of the pastoral office which relate to the support of the ministry and churches because they are vitally connected. No church can be said to take proper care of itself which does not take proper care of its pastor. And God generally treats churches as they treat their ministers. Righteous retribution often follows meanness, avarice and injustice to his servants. He gives them ministers like themselves. "It shall be like people like priest." On the other hand, those churches which have the most honorable record are distinguished by their tender care of the reputation, usefulness and comfort of their under shepherds. When ministers themselves are at fault in their temporal matters they must bear their own burdens as best they may. But as a rule the principle holds good that, by the blessing of the great Head of the church, long-continued, useful, prosperous pastorates are the joint results of ministerial faithfulness and of conscientious parochial care. Christian Intelligencer.

Haven't Time.

To hear people talk, you would think there was one thing scarcer and more universally wanted than money, and that is time. Nobody has time to do anything but what he likes; we mean, of course, what is absolutely necessary. They would have the greatest pleasure in doing everything you wish, and a great deal more too; but really they "haven't time." It is a wonder to every one, they tell you, how they get through their work. From morning to night they are at it, and they scarcely know what it is to sit down, except at meals.

It is the same with every one, of whatever occupation, or of no occupation at all. Nay, the curious thing is that the person of no occupation has generally least time to spare. He doesn't know how it is, but somehow or other he really hasn't time to do anything you want him to do. Persons never have much money to spare, however rich they are, but then they have some. If they are very well to do they will give you what they truly call a "trifle," or very inappropriately denominate a "mite," in allusion to the famous widow, whose offering, though it was a mite, was all she had. But scarcely any one confesses to having time, not even those who have most of that scarce article. Five minutes is to them almost an impossible donation. You may as well ask them to make you a present of their cash box as to give you half an hour of their precious time. "Time is money," say they, and, while both are scarce, time is scarcer than money. "I will give you a subscription," answers the man who is asked to help in some good work, "but you must not ask me to do anything; my time is too precious." "You have my good wishes, my dear friend; I am sorry I can't give you more; my means are limited, and as for my time I positively have none to spare." Of course there are exceptions to this rule, as to every other; but there is no one whose experience will not confirm the fact that, as a rule, nobody has time to do his necessary business, much less to spare for others' benefit.

Time was when people had plenty of time, more even than they knew what to do with. Words which had a meaning for them have gone clean out of use in our day. They had a word "pastime," which no one ever hears now. "Pastime" meant to them some mode of whiling away the time that hung so heavily on their hands—a diversion or amusement which would help to fill up pleasantly the gaps that time left in the lives of the busiest of our forefathers. Nay, so burdensome did it sometimes become that they even spoke of "killing time." They tried to get it out of the way, as a man does his enemy, by some violent means, devising cunning methods of cutting short its course. Pastime, indeed! How would our nineteenth century folk stare if you used such an expression now! The idea of their having to invent ways of making time pass more quickly. Why, it is as much as ever they can do to keep pace with it, to overtake it; you may as well tell them to catch a steam engine as to get ahead of it. They have long arrears to make up before they can get sight of it. As for killing time, they would remind you of the famous receipt for dressing a hare. But the thought is too shocking; none but a madman would think of it nowadays. When a starving beggar in his sober senses throws his loaf into the stream, then may you expect the timeless wretch of the present day deliberately and of forethought to perpetrate time-slaughter. * * * It is wonderful how much time is lost by want of order and method. Half our time is wasted in doing things pell-mell, as the humor takes us, without plan or forethought. As a rule, we may take for granted that the person who "hasn't time" is one who does not know how to use it. He fritters it away, not perhaps in idleness, but in laboriously doing nothing, like the man whose purse is always empty, not because he has not money enough, but because he spends it he knows not how, on the spur of the moment, without accommodating his expenditure to his income. He has fewer advantages at greater cost than his less gifted but more thrifty neighbor. Time, like money, will go much further when well and carefully laid out, and involve much less labor. An orderly and methodical person will know exactly what to do, when, and how best to do it. Hence duties succeed each other in regular course, and are well and easily done, and leave a good margin of time for contingencies. The disorderly and unmethodical person is generally fussy, muddling and hurried. He rushes from one thing to another, doing nothing well, and leaving much undone, and often obliged to do what he has done over again. His head does not save his heels. Instead of master of his time, he becomes the slave of circumstances.—The Penny Post.

A Literal Turn of Mind.

The Irish bull is the result of a fog in the mind. There is another humorous method of expression, the result of too much literalness of mind. Human thoughts have come, from much use, to run in certain grooves or ruts, and to express themselves in figurative meanings; but there are some people who persistently refuse to take these meanings figuratively, but literally, and so in their answers say the most unexpected things. They are amusing without knowing it. Let me give a few instances of this from persons with "a literal turn of mind."

A lady who delighted in analyzing feelings and emotions met a poor sailor who had suffered shipwreck, and asked him compassionately:

"How did you feel, my dear man, when the cold waves broke over you?" He replied simply and truly: "Wet, ma'am; very wet."

A Sunday school teacher once asked her class:

"What did the Israelites do after crossing the Red sea?" No one seemed prepared, but at last a little girl said:

"Don't know, ma'am. Guess they dried themselves."

A boy who had not been sufficiently instructed in regard to a future state was asked by his school teacher:

"Do you know where wicked little boys go who play marbles on Sunday afternoon?" He replied promptly: "Some on 'em goes to the common, and some on 'em goes down to the river."

A soldier, with collar and bosom sadly begrimed, was asked angrily by his captain:

"Patrick O'Flynn, how long do you wear your shirt?"

"Twenty-eight inches," was the quick reply.

Wit is said to excite an agreeable surprise. Here is wit not so agreeable, but still wit, and doubtless a surprise to the victim:

Passing through Chatham street, a countryman was clamorously besieged by a shop-keeper.

"Have you any fine shirts?" he asked at last.

"Splendid assortment, sir. Step in, sir. Every price and style. Cheapest in the market, sir."

"Are they clean?"

"To be sure. Step in, sir."

"Then you had better put one on, for you need it."

Speaking of disagreeable surprises makes me think of the literal little girl who was told by her prudent mamma that a Mr. Jenkins was to dine with them, and that she must be sure not to make any remarks about his nose. The unfortunate gentleman had lost that very important feature, and at dinner the child stared at him in a puzzled way, and at last said in a loud tone to her mother: "Why, mamma, I don't see why you told me not to say anything about Mr. Jenkins' nose, for he hasn't got any."

Swans.

The nest of the swan is a thick and rather untidy mass of sticks, reeds, flags and rushes. From the fact of the birds naturally preferring the most secluded spots by the water, we more often find a swan's nest on an eyot than on either bank of the river; the osier beds are perhaps the localities most favored by them. The eggs are six or eight in number, and are hatched in five or six weeks. The young birds are termed cygnets, and are covered with a grayish-brown plumage, which is not entirely lost till the beginning of the third year. Though the swan is, in general, very gentle and inoffensive, the male bird will defend the nest with great courage, and advance to the onset with ruffled plumes and every demonstration of anger; nor is it, from its muscular powers, an antagonist to be despised. While the cygnets are very young, one or two of them will sometimes climb up on to their mother's back, who never sails along more proudly than when her dusky brood is thus cradled between her snowy wings. Swans do not breed until they are several years old, and they mate strictly in pairs; the technical terms for the male and female are cob and pen. The cob or male has a thicker neck and a larger "herry" at the base of the bill than the pen or female; he also swims more buoyantly from having more volume of lungs. Maturity in both cob and pen is shown by the size of the "berry" and the depth of the orange color of the bill. On the Thames the nests are sedulously watched by the fisherman, who receives half a crown for each young bird that is hatched. He also takes care of the birds during inclement winters, receiving two shillings a week for the time during which he has given them food and shelter. Taking swans' eggs from the nests, and certain other birds, was an offense severely dealt with in old times. We find in an act of Henry the Seventh that "no manner of person, of what condition or degree he be, take or cause to be taken, be it upon his owne ground or any other man's, the egges of any fawcon, goshawk, laners or swans, out of the nest, upon paine of imprisonment of a yere and a day, and fine at the king's will, the one-halfe thereof to the king, and the other halfe to the owner of the ground where the egges were so taken."—Art Journal.

COMMON sense is satisfied to perceive that, in human affairs, the proper balance between liberty and authority will ever be attained only through variations, and that the power which can prevent every error is incompatible with that freedom by which any good is to be truly attained.—Churchman.

As White as Snow.

An American gentleman died lately at Geneva, Switzerland, whose last moments were marked by memorable manifestations of the grace of God. Great and protracted bodily suffering was attended by the richest displays of the all-sustaining love of the Redeemer whom he had loved and served for many years, and to whom his large wealth and extensive influence had been consecrated in well-doing. The night before his death a storm among the mountains left Mont Blanc robed in snow, and as the invalid looked out of his window upon the splendid scene he said to his wife: "Just as that mountain is covered with snow my Redeemer has covered me with the white robe of his righteousness." Shortly afterward, raising his arms as if he had a vision of Christ, he exclaimed: "My Savior! my Savior! I come! I come!" and gently breathed his life away.

What has the popular unbelief of the day to give in the place of such peace amid sufferings and triumph in death? This Christian gentleman was no weak-minded enthusiast, but a business man of refined tastes and culture. But he had laid all at his Savior's feet, and his triumphant death was only the consummation of a vigorous religious life.

Death-bed repentance is often open to criticism, and dying experiences are sometimes set down to the effects of disease, weakness and medicine. But in the large majority of well-authenticated cases of Christian victory in death the intellect is clear, the affections are in full flow and there is nothing to cloud the scene. Often, indeed, there is a quickening of the higher mental faculties, and especially of the moral powers and spiritual nature, which intensifies the reality of those experiences which Christianity alone evokes. In this way the religion of Jesus is ever being put to the severest tests. The evidence is so uniform in persons of all ages, and of all conditions of mind, estate and culture, that it amounts to a demonstration. These dying experiences are the culmination of varied spiritual exercises, and of that discipline of trial by which souls are refined as gold in the furnace. In almost every case they center around the personal presence and power of Jesus Christ, and of his righteousness in the believer's soul. They accompany a strong assurance of pardon and peace through "the blood of sprinkling," which "cleanseth from all sin." And this apprehension of the Savior by the believer it is which makes the glory of his passage into life.—Christian Intelligencer.

AN IRISH LEGEND.—A writer, speaking of the Castle of Howth, near Dublin, says: "The steps to the front door are very grand, extending across the whole front of the building. The wings are covered with ivy. The main entrance used to be left open during the dinner hour, until a very recent date. The origin of the custom is thus related: About three hundred years ago there lived in the west of Ireland a celebrated female chieftain named Grace O'Malley, of Grana Wile. She owned a vast territory, and had castles to defend it, and ships and men. So renowned was she that Queen Elizabeth invited her to her court, whither she went, accompanied by a large retinue, where she doubtless was feasted in accordance with her rank. On her return she was forced to land on the east coast of Ireland to procure provisions, which had fallen short. It happened that she landed at Howth, and walking up to the castle made known her wants. The servants refused to comply with her wishes at once, telling her she must wait because the family were at dinner. Indignant at such treatment, she returned to the shore to re-embark. There she saw a little boy playing. 'Whose child is this?' 'It is the son of the lord of the castle,' was the reply. Thereupon she ordered him to be seized and carried on board her vessel, and away she sailed to her home in the west. Here the young prince was kept a prisoner for some time, but finally Grana yielded to the petition of the father and released the boy, on condition that ever after the door should stand open during dinner, to welcome all comers."

HOW THE BIBLE GROWS ON US.—If you come to Holy Scripture with growth in grace, and with aspirations for yet higher attainments, the book grows upon you. It is ever beyond you, and cheerily cries: "Higher yet! Excelsior!" Many books in my library are now behind and beneath me; I read them years ago with considerable pleasure; I have read them since with disappointment; I shall never read them again, for they are of no service to me. They were good in their way once, and so were the clothes I wore when I was ten years old; but I have outgrown them—I know more than these books, and know wherein they are faulty. Nobody ever outgrows the Scripture; the book widens and deepens with our years. It is true it cannot really grow, for it is perfect; but it does so to our apprehension. The deeper you dig into Scripture the more you find that it is a great abyss of truth. The beginner learns four or five points of orthodoxy, and says: "I understand the gospel; I have grasped all the Bible." Wait a bit, and when his soul knows more and more of Christ he will confess: "Thy commandment is exceeding broad; I have only begun to understand it."—Spurgeon.

ALEXANDER DUMAS, the elder, when he gave a dinner party to commercial men, had a somewhat singular method of deciding the time for the inferior wine to be produced. He enjoined his servants to put the best wine on the table at the beginning of the meal, while the guests' hands were clear; "then," said he, "watch the conversation, and directly you hear any single one of the company say, 'I, who am an honest man,' you may be quite sure that all their heads have gone astray, and you can serve up any rubbish you choose."

THE Glasgow Presbytery has been discussing the new hymnal recommended by the synod, and the report of the proceedings shows that difficulties which beset the compilers of "hymns, ancient and modern," are not special to them. Dr. Eadie, in calling attention to the book, observed that the introductory remarks were good, but the compilation itself was not at all times, at all points, in harmony with the principles therein enunciated. As to the eighty-third hymn, "Let high-born seraphs tune the lyre," Dr. Eadie asked the moderator to inform him what high-born meant. "Born," he proceeded, "implies birth, and birth maternity; who was the mother?" With reference to the one hundred and tenth hymn, "There is a gate that stands ajar," Dr. Eadie "felt that 'ajar' was most objectionable. Surely the gate was wide open; then why 'ajar?'" On verse three of hymn 117 the doctor was increasingly critical, pointing out that, according to its description, "we were first 'commberers of the ground,' then we were 'grafted,' and next, by a fresh figure, in the course of four lines we were told to be 'born again.'" In hymn 316 occurs the line,

"Seer and sybil both attesting;"

and Dr. Eadie put it to the presbytery whether it was not marvelous language to find in a Scotch hymn-book, published and authorized in the nineteenth century. "The leading thought of the verse," said the doctor, "is from the Apostle Peter, and are we to sing that he stood in need of or gained any corroboration from an Italian spae-wife?" The last objection taken by Dr. Eadie was topographical and horticultural in its nature—hymn 301, beginning

"By cool Siloam's shady rill
How sweet the lily grows;"

and it so happening, as he pointed out, that there is neither shady rill nor growing lily by Siloam. A long and interesting discussion followed, and finally, after a proposal to go through the hymns seriatim had, with some show of alacrity, been negatived, a committee was appointed to "consider the matter."

THE DISTRIBUTION OF BEARS.—The bear family (Ursidæ,) though comprising a comparatively small number of species, is yet one of the most widespread of all the carnivora, being found all over the earth's surface, except in Africa and Australia. In the latter country there is an animal somewhat resembling the bear in appearance, and having the tree-climbing habit, known popularly as the Australian bear. This animal is, however, not a bear, but belongs, with its cousins, the kangaroo, bandicoot and opossum, to another family. Regarding the existence of the bear in Africa there has long been some difference of opinion. Herodotus, Virgil and other ancient writers speak of Libyan bears. Pliny alludes to Numidian bears being exhibited by Ethiopian hunters in a Roman circus, 61 B. C. Latterly Ehrenberg and Forskal both mention a black plantigrade animal, called by the natives karcai, which inhabits the mountains of Abyssinia. They hunted and saw it, but failed to capture a specimen. It is possible that the bear may yet be found in at least a portion of the vast unexplored area of that continent, but the opinion that it does not exist there is now generally held by naturalists, and it may reasonably be entertained until controverted by the finding of a specimen.—Popular Science Monthly.

THE LAUGHING PLANT.—A singular phenomenon was discovered during the recent explorations in Arabia. It is called the laughing plant, from the effect produced by the seeds. When they are pulverized and eaten in small quantities, the person eating them will soon begin to laugh loudly, then to sing, dance, and to do all manner of absurd things. This lasts for an hour, after which he goes to sleep, and, having slept an hour, wakes up utterly unconscious of what has occurred. It has been suggested that this plant might be made a substitute for alcohol, and that it would have the advantage of being cheaper, until the government should see through the trick and commence to tax it. But it is scarcely probable that the Arabian plant could in fact be made popular in that capacity, for it does not appear that it inspires the person who partakes of it with a desire to whip his wife, murder his mother, or indulge in any of the little pleasantries that alcohol of the period moves one to perpetrate.

A LITTLE BOY had been visiting at the house of a relative, where he took some primary lessons in the history of the American revolution, and how the Americans whipped the Britishers. The lad returned home full of his new subject, and at the tea-table said to his father:

"Pa, be you a Britisher?"

"Yes, my son, I was born in England."

"Well, we whipped you!" retorted the youngster.

MR. A. BRONSON ALCOTT was once expounding his theory of the sin of eating flesh, and said: "A man who eats pork becomes a little swinish, does he not? And if he eats mutton he is inclined to be sheepish." "Perhaps so," replied Dr. James Walker, "but I have noticed that men who lived on vegetables are apt to be—rather small—potatoes."

JOHN WESLEY used to say that thirty minutes was long enough for a good sermon, and too long for a poor one. Wesley knew what he was about well enough, and there are many sermonizers we know of who could profitably give heed to the above hint.

"SHON," said a Dutchman, "you may say vat you please pout pad neighbors. I have had te vorst neighbor as never vas. Mine pigs und mine hens com' home mit dere ears split; und fodder duy two of dem com' home missing."

Religious Intelligence.

BISHOP COLENSO was prohibited by the Bishop of Oxford recently from preaching in Oxford, England.

THE expulsion of the Sisters of Charity from Mexico closes forty-three charitable establishments, and sends out of the country four hundred and ten sisters.

ITALY is moving in the direction of religious light and freedom as never before. All the Protestant missionaries there are gathering a rich spiritual harvest.

THE Pope, at his reception of Dr. Manning, rejoiced at the progress of the Catholic religion in England, and hoped the enemies of the church would not be able to stop the movement.

THIRTY years ago Parson Hedstrom was the only Swedish Methodist missionary in the United States. Now there are ten thousand Scandinavian members of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Europe and America.

FOURTEEN years ago there was but one native girls' day school in Canton, China. Now there are nearly a dozen, well attended, and several schools connected with the mission studying Christian books.

COMMITTEES of conference on the part of the Northern and Southern Presbyterian churches, in session in Baltimore, adjourned January 14. They failed to agree upon a basis for the establishment of fraternal relations.

RELIGIOUS PROGRESSION IN THE HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.—Some of the papers having given currency to a charge that the Sandwich Island churches have been retrograding, in both piety and attendance, since the transfer of ecclesiastical control from the American Mission Board to the native preachers, the Evangelist denies the charge, and furnishes several facts showing that the very opposite is true. The "new department" dates in 1863. Then there were only four ordained Hawaiian pastors on the islands, now there are not less than thirty; then there were only four or five churches, now there are fifty. In discipline and spiritual tone they compare well with those which were under American supervision. Their annual missionary contributions have advanced from $3,569 to $10,849. In 1863 there were only two female boarding schools for all the islands, with not over thirty pupils. Now there are five places where schools of this character may be kept—one on each of the larger islands of the group, excepting Oahu, where there are two. On Kauai there is also now a theological seminary, with young ministers training for the work. The change from foreign to home supervision seems to have been followed by real and substantial growth.

ACCORDING to a correspondent of a Boston journal there has not been for many years, if ever, so strong and widespread a religious interest in Vermont as now. A large proportion of the churches have been quickened in some degree, while in many places powerful revivals are in progress. The work seems not at all dependent upon any agency except that of the Holy Spirit. In Franklin county, Swanton, Bakersfield, West Enosburg and Enosburg Falls have been especially visited. These are all farming communities. At West Enosburg thirty young persons have been subjects of the work, among them the three sons of one family. In Swanton union meetings by the Congregationalists and Methodists, commencing with the week of prayer, are still kept up. A large number of conversions are reported. In Washington county the work is perhaps more general than elsewhere. Most of the towns are more or less touched. In Barre such a revival was probably never known. Our exchanges contain quite a number of revival notices every week, though the proportion is not as large as in some years. One notable ingathering was enjoyed recently by the Second Presbyterian church of Altoona, Pennsylvania, eighty-eight new members having been received at the last communion, all but five on confession of their faith.—Christian Union.

FEMALE BRANCH OF CITY MISSIONS.—The female branch of the New York City Mission and Tract Society have done a good work during the past year, and are preparing for extended usefulness during the one that is before us. Its officers and managers are drawn from our strongest and most active churches, and are ladies of the most exalted Christian type, as well as of the highest social standing. Their association with the enterprise is a guarantee that everything will be done wisely, energetically, as well as "decently and in order." The corps of female assistant-missionaries now numbers seven, and the work assigned them is in the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth and seventh wards of the city. Persons are now on probation for service as missionaries in two other wards. These female assistant missionaries are members in good standing of some evangelical church, who have first undergone a period of probation, and given satisfactory proof of their adaptedness to the work. These are superintended and assisted in their work by ladies appointed for the purpose from among the board of managers, and they assist the missionary of the ward by tract distribution, visitation of the sick, directing the people to Christ, organizing social prayer meetings, gathering children into sewing and industrial schools, and in other ways. The following figures show the summary of the year's work: Tracts distributed, 25,894; Bibles, 36; Testaments, 30; persons taken into Sunday schools and Bible classes, 307; taken into day schools, 68; taken into sewing schools, 49; persons brought into churches and mission chapels, 4,093; united with churches, 73; hopeful conversions, 29; missionary visits made, 9,607; religious meetings held, 259; meetings attended, 106; temperance pledges obtained, 37; families relieved, 627; amount given, $1,073.41.—Christian Intelligencer.

CHANGE OF RATES.

In conformity with an agreement between the several papers published in the interest of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, the subscription price of the Advocate, including postage, will hereafter be as follows, viz:

One year	$2 50
Six months	1 50
Three months	80

The Subscription Price of the Advocate is One Dollar and a Quarter per year to ministers of the gospel, and the same to the widows of deceased itinerant preachers. Where bills have been sent charging them more than that amount it was owing to the fact that they were not known as such to the book-keeper, and if they will inform us the accounts will be corrected. Should they have already paid we will credit the amount overpaid on subscription, or dispose of it as they may order.

Look Out for Acknowledgments.—Subscribers and other persons writing to us should look in the letter list for the acknowledgment of their letters. The letters which reach us on or before Saturday of each week are acknowledged in the issue of the following Thursday.

RATES.

The New Orleans Christian Advocate will be furnished to subscribers hereafter at the following rates, including postage:

One Year	$2 50
Six Months	1 50
Three Months	80

$1.25 A YEAR

to all Ministers of the Gospel, traveling or local and widows of deceased traveling preachers.

to any person forwarding to us four new yearly subscribers, with Ten Dollars.

The Surprises of Grace.

The Scriptures furnish some instances of remarkable goodness and piety existing under circumstances where we would least expect to find them. The case of the Syrophenician woman is in point. Living in a heathen coast, herself a Gentile, and probably without the advantages of the religious training of the Jews, she astonishes the Savior by the greatness of her faith. The centurion, whose servant was sick, affords another illustration of wonderful faith where none would be likely to look for it. A pagan by birth and education, but by the chances of his profession thrown in contact with the Jews and their religion, he rises above all in the grasp and simplicity of his trust in Christ. The apostles and others, who enjoyed the most intimate personal converse with Jesus, and who had been thoroughly instructed in the doctrines and worship of the Old Testament, were inferior to this soldier in their faith. Up to that time, however it might have been later, Christ had "not found so great faith; no, not in Israel." Extraordinary eminence is given to this Roman soldier by the Savior's words.

A kindred truth is brought out in the healing of the ten lepers, where the only one who returned to thank their benefactor was a Samaritan. He was the last one of whom such a return could have been expected. If any were delinquent, this was the likeliest to be wanting in gratitude, as men usually judge. The evangelist's brief touch is a master stroke, bringing out the striking feature of the scene with almost startling effect: "And he was a Samaritan." In that inimitable parable, given in answer to the question: Who is my neighbor? the priest and the Levite, of whom we have a right to expect the most enlarged benevolence, are altogether wanting in compassion, while the Samaritan alone fulfills the commandment of love to our neighbor. In the parables of the prodigal son, and of the Pharisee and publican, there is the same exhibition of good in contrast with those whose circumstances were more favorable, but whose conduct was not in keeping with their privileges or profession.

Instances of contrition and repentance, such as that of the woman who washed the Savior's feet with her tears and wiped them with the hairs of her head, and such as that of Zaccheus, the publican, who came down and received his Lord joyfully, are in the same line of illustration. The thief on the cross has been the subject of meditation and study throughout the gospel ages, and his repentance and faith are more wonderful and instructive because exhibited in such close connection with crime and its punishment. Of all the hardened and deriding spectators of the Savior's crucifixion, only this malefactor was moved to repentance, and only the centurion, who commanded, and those who were watching with him, were constrained to confess: "Truly this was the Son of God."

The conversion of Cornelius was every way remarkable, but the chief surprise in his case is that a man in his calling, an eminent military character, whose life had been spent in camps and courts, should be found so devout and spiritual before the gospel was preached to him. In form and profession he was neither a Jew nor a Christian, but still he was a man of prayer, and doubtless accepted with God. Of all the people in Philippi we should hardly have picked out the jailer as the most hopeful subject of conversion. His business was calculated to harden his nature, and his associations, except during that one memorable night, must have been unfavorable in the extreme. His contemplated suicide in the moments of greatest consternation shows that at that time he was in the depths of pagan darkness and ignorance. He passes, however, from this condition of sheer heathenism to that of Christian assurance and faith in the space of a few hours. The conversion of St. Paul might be enlarged upon in this connection. It was a surprise to Jews and Christians alike. He was the last man of that generation that either would have thought of as likely to be changed in his course. There were miraculous causes in his awakening, but, with these fully considered, the conversion of Paul stands as a marvel that human calculations would never have anticipated.

History and observation supply us with illustrations in accord with those which we find in the Bible. Such deep piety and pure faith as were exhibited in the Dalrymau's Daughter, and conversions like those of Thomas Oliver, Colonel Gardner and John Newton, are of like import. Sincere and humble piety like that of Cornelius has doubtless illustrations in the heathen lands of to-day. There is exalted virtue, remarkable faith, and a deep insight and experience of divine things far removed from the ordinary track of privileges and opportunities. Here and there they are brought to light as revelations of what God is doing apart from the more favorable conditions of salvation, and as exhibitions of his abounding mercy and his power to save to the uttermost. The hopefulness of Christian charity should be stimulated healthfully by these instances, which are only astonishing because they seem to set at naught the circumstances and methods which have come to be regarded as essential to the attainment of salvation. There is danger of limiting the ample breadth of infinite goodness, and of bounding our faith in the power of the gospel, by lines altogether too narrow. Every now and then we are rebuked by the discovery of gems where no intimation of their existence was seen. A mine of riches opens where no one had thought of looking for the precious metal. There are springs of water gushing up in the desert, and the wilderness is gladdened and beautified by a bloom and fragrance altogether in contrast with the gloomy solitudes which they adorn.

It may often happen that those whom we have regarded as nearest the kingdom of God are most distant, and that those whom we have marked as most hopeless are already about to yield to the drawings of the Spirit. The final day will doubtless reveal many surprises of grace. What we have found in the sacred page, and in the imperfect field of observation and experience, will prove to have been only the tokens and predictions of that which awaits us in the world of light. The wonders of grace will then be uncovered, and we shall witness the fruits of redemption, as they have been gathered from the entire scope of human history, and from all the varied conditions and circumstances of human experience. The surprises of grace here are as the shells on the shore, while those of glory will be as the unmeasured wealth in the ocean's depths.

From Oregon.

Mr. Editor: Accompanied by Rev. J. E. Bradley and family, we took leave of many dear friends in and around Keachie on the seventeenth of November, Bros. Fullilove and Spell kindly furnishing us conveyance to Shreveport. There we were warmly received by Rev. A. E. Goodwyn, and Bro. A. B. Crowder, with his large-hearted and affectionate mother. How well these dear friends know how to make itinerant preachers comfortable and feel at home!

Baggage and all arranged, we took the train for St. Louis on the night of the eighteenth.

A peculiar feeling of sympathetic melancholy stole over us as we separated from all our friends, and bade adieu to our beloved and downtrodden Louisiana. In due time we reached St. Louis. There we were cordially received and welcomed at the residence of Governor Polk, arrangements having been previously made. We spent a delightful day in St. Louis. Never shall we forget the favors rendered us by Bro. L. D. Dameron and his brother; also Bro. Babington, and Governor Polk, with his estimable family. We enjoyed the pleasure, too, of forming the acquaintance of Drs. McAnally and Bledsoe and other brethren. What a city St. Louis is, and what a marvel the great railroad bridge spanning the Mississippi river—one of the wonders of modern age!

The next point of importance at which we stopped was Omaha, Nebraska. This is a sort of outpost town, situated just on the edge of the plains. Here they have on hand quite a variety of eatables, where emigrants can replenish lunch-baskets, haversacks, etc. At Omaha we took the emigrant train on the Union Pacific railroad to Ogden, a distance of one thousand and thirty-two miles.

Vast plains stretched out on either side as far as the eye could penetrate, without scarcely a green herb. With the exception of the little towns on the railroad, the country appears almost entirely destitute of human inhabitants. Occasionally there is a small hut or little settlement; houses raised a few feet above the ground, daubed with mud and straw, with a stovepipe peering through the top. After speeding on for many miles, brown, bare hills come in view. They continued to rise higher and higher till they culminated into vast mountain chains, with their dismal defiles, jutting crags, rocky heights and lofty peaks. They appear in almost every conceivable shape, packed and piled mountain upon mountain, until nature seems heaved and launched in the wildest confusion. Ogden is a very pretty town of some five thousand inhabitants. It is situated at the head of Salt Lake, and is entirely Mormon. There are schools, churches, newspapers and everything. It forms the junction between the Union Pacific and Central Pacific railroads, a distance of eight hundred and eighty-two miles from San Francisco. A great deal of the scenery is monotonous, but other portions sublimely grand.

When we got into California the contrast with the dreary plains was great and pleasing. Fir-trees, evergreens of various kinds, smiling landscapes, vegetable gardens and luxuriant wheat-fields greeted us on all sides; while a genial sun, balmy air and luscious fruits awoke in us feelings of gratitude to the Giver of all good gifts.

We finally arrived at the golden city—San Francisco—but had little opportunity of seeing much of it, as the grand old ship Ajax was in port, to leave in a few hours for Portland, Oregon. We went immediately on board, and were soon out on the bosom of the boisterous deep. The wind blew, and the tumultuous waves rolled and pitched as if with violent rage. The ship reeled and rocked until our crew was mowed down with sickness, as a garrison before an invading foe. But the waves of the sea obey the voice of the Lord, and through his goodness and mercy we were brought safely into port. Thus, after twenty-one days of weary travel by land and sea, we find ourselves at this our present home. We were most cordially received. The brethren had procured for us a neat and comfortable house, which we now occupy.

This is a wonderful country. There are several great mountain chains which traverse the State. Between the mountains there are fine fertile valleys. The Willamette valley, I think, is by far the best portion of the State. It is said to be one hundred and seventy-five miles long and forty-five wide. It has a population of about sixty-eight thousand. Wheat, oats, timothy and clover are grown to great perfection here. Think of wheat yielding from thirty to forty and sometimes sixty bushels per acre! Garden vegetables, berries and fruits of various kinds are produced in great abundance; so much so that there is scarcely any value attached to them. Fine stock of various kinds is found here. It is really a fine country in certain localities. Men of means could do well. But it requires capital to get hold of things to enable a man to avail himself of the resources and advantages of the country. Young men, either laborers or business men, might do well.

With regard to Southern Methodism in this country, it is merely in an embryo or infantile state. In my judgment it is properly and should be considered missionary ground. It is really a difficult field to cultivate. The church needs to be organized and developed as a whole. There is too much individuality. People have come here from all quarters. Consequently it is a sort of heterogeneous mass. Nearly all sorts of isms and every shade of skepticism have found favor on this coast. There is very little religious sympathy in this land. Gospel seeds that have been sown here are comparable to those that fell by the wayside, on stony ground or among thorns. The celestial plant of Christianity has not struck its roots deeply. Its growth is by no means vigorous. There is evidently a great want of faith, of holy zeal and consecration to God among the people. The support of ministers of the various denominations is meager and hard to get, in consequence of which many have been driven to secular employment.

Bro. White is here, abundant in labors, full of zeal and the Holy Ghost. He held my quarterly meeting on the thirteenth and fourteenth instant. Congregations large, attentive and serious. We have a small society in this place, but we stand greatly in need of a house of worship. We hope ere long to build. A move has already been made in that direction. I sincerely hope that the brethren and friends generally of this valley will aid us in this noble enterprise. While laboring and toiling in this distant field my mind often goes back to the dear ones left behind. How much I desired to be with you at Conference, and how I sympathize with you in your oppressed condition. May the Lord, who directs all things aright, hasten the day of your deliverance. Brethren, pray for us, that we may through grace save ourselves and those who hear us.

N. M. Skipworth.

Fresh Preaching.

Dr. John Hall, in his Yale lectures, says a great many sensible things about preaching. We give his eighth lecture, as published in the Independent:

We have seen the characteristics of a good sermon. We are now to consider how freshness and variety are to be given to continuous preaching to the same people. In other words, we are to inquire: What is the best distribution we can make of our materials for pulpit instruction?

(a.) Some are inclined to class preaching. They distribute their hearers into "young," "old," "young men," "church members," etc., and make sermons to suit each class, formally addressing them as they are grouped. The "working classes" are often singled out in Great Britain for exhortation. Good doubtless has been done in this way by men who could not but do good in any way in which they worked. But it is doubtful if it be a wise method. When John the Baptist gave directions to publicans and soldiers as such, he did so at their request. They isolated and classified themselves. The instructions of Scripture are not classified in this way. Each person is encouraged to read and study the whole Bible. All are to dig in this field and be enriched thereby. Nor is it a set of rubrics, but a book of principles, in the learning and application of which the mind is exercised and strengthened. The maiden does not find one part of it for her, from which she is to pass away to another when she becomes a mother. Her Bible is still her Bible, as before.

There is danger of impairing habits of attention on this plan. When young men are getting their portion the rest may be justifiably absent or absent-minded. Better that each should feel that his special portion may come in the next sentence, and be on the lookout for it.

The tendency is already great enough to hear for others, and this is fostered when young men, for example, are addressed. The older men think it "very good for the young men." It is doubtful if in an ordinary healthy congregation a "sermon to young men" greatly increases their number. Better by manly, vigorous preaching, bringing divine truth to bear on manly pursuits, by exercising the mind, to make the services habitually interesting to men, old and young, and so dispel the illusion that religion is for women and children. It is a great thing to have a congregation to which you can habitually say: "Men and brethren."

"But is there not to be an exception in favor of sermons to children?" Probably not. After children have left the nursery they generally get their meals with the family. This is wise. So it is best they should do in the church. Instead of singling them out and giving them a surfeit on an exceptional day, it is better to put an incident, an anecdote into each sermon, and so put it that the children shall feel that they are not forgotten. So the habit of attending and of listening is cultivated in them. Let them grow up as part of the Christian household and be witnesses of baptisms and communions.

(b.) Announced preaching is another doubtful method of sustaining interest. It is a temptation to out-of-the-way themes. It generates a bad habit of mind among the hearers. It promotes competitive preaching, which is an abomination, and it is a mistake in practice. What about the days you have nothing announced? Why, the popular inference is that you have nothing worth hearing—nothing, in fact, but the gospel.

There are enough of ecclesiastical gypsies already—people who go round and hear all the men who have something "interesting!" The worst instructed Christians are commonly just those who hear almost everybody and are of little use to anybody.

(c.) Special preaching, as a rule, costs much and effects little. The special preaching we mean includes sermons to "the times," for special occasions, critical periods in the history of Church or State. The interest of them is largely in the man—what he says. He is defining his position or vindicating his or his friends' consistency, and the people enjoy the pleasing satisfaction of sitting in judgment on him. It may be asked: Should not the great events be noticed? Yes; but in the ordinary way. Let them fall in without any preceding blowing of trumpets. Raise no expectations. If there is to be any salutary excitement, it will be after you have given your views. Announce some public topic beforehand, and every one who ever made an address (and who has not?) begins to think how he would treat it; and your divergence from his plan is a failure of course. He is put in an unfavorable attitude for learning spiritual truths. I am afraid most funeral addresses come under the "specials." You are tempted to say much in sympathy with the feelings of mourners keenly appreciative of the virtues lost to them, and may say more than is felt to be just by the general audience, who will be apt to conclude that eminent saintship is less rare than they imagined. Be measured and moderate in your language in these addresses—the hardest you will have to make until some reform is effected in the funerals of the country.

It may be thought that the elimination of these elements of special effort will leave the work monotonous, one sermon following another, all as much alike as the hymn-books.

But it is not so really. Let there be, for example:

Vigorous consecutive teaching, formally intimated or informally pursued. Courses of sermons are very good in this direction. One each year on such themes as the Decalogue, the Lord's Prayer, the Sermon on the Mount, is often useful. There are portions of the Bible like unknown lands to many of the people. Carry them over these. Did you ever see a Christian momentarily paralyzed when told to find the prophet Amos? Help men over this difficulty. The minor prophets form an admirable theme for pulpit instruction. You do not live in vain if you make the people to know their Bibles.

There are two main methods of getting knowledge—the Aristotelian and the Baconian. How much progress the human mind has made on the latter plan! Now the expositor of Scripture proceeds on the Baconian plan, where the texts of Scripture are to him as the objects and facts of nature to the scientist. His results may not have the showy appearance of many ingenious speculations, that shine like the crystalline spheres of Ptolemy; but they are solid and substantial. On this modest, patient Baconian plan the Bible expositor proceeds, and leads his hearers, with the modesty of true science intensified by the recollection that he is dealing with the things of God, and on each trophy he writes: "Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but to thy name be the glory."

It has been attempted to give freshness and interest to the services of the church by the "church year;" but a comparison of England and Scotland will show how little reliance can be placed on this arrangement. There are events that are in their own nature connected with the church life, which a wise minister will explain and magnify as they occur. Such are baptism, the profession of faith made by young believers, the communion of the Lord's Supper, and the ordination of church officers. Let these occasions be seized for giving substantial, definite instruction, and true church life is furthered, while variety of service is secured.

The same remark applies to home and foreign missions, on which the truth of the Scriptures must be brought to bear. The church is to be kept up to the conflict with evil. If she fails in the direct practical work of evangelizing and enlightening, she is like a man paralyzed on one side. The want of exercise tends to weaken the other and increase the debility.

"But this will make men churchly, sectarian, bigoted." There is no greater mistake. Your true bigot is the ignorant man. The truly catholic man is the man of clear perceptions of the principles and underlying foundations of things.

New Orleans District Conference.

The New Orleans District Conference will meet at the Carondelet Street church, New Orleans, on Thursday, April 8, at five o'clock P. M. On Friday night, at half-past seven o'clock, there will be a district love-feast at the Carondelet Street church, to which all the Methodists of the district are earnestly invited. On Sunday afternoon, April 11, at three o'clock, the regular anniversary of the district Sunday schools will be held. Bishop Paine will be present and preside at the District Conference.

J. B. Walker, P. E.

Dr. W. V. Taylor, of the Louisiana Conference, passed through the city last week on his way to Tennessee. Bro. Taylor has been compelled to leave his pastoral charge on account of bad health. His medical advisers fear that he will not be able to resume his ministerial labors for some months, if ever. He desires the prayers of his brethren of the Conference. We trust that he may soon be restored to health and to his work.

Rev. Mr. Merrill, of the Tennessee Conference, and now stationed at Gallatin, is spending a few days in our city. We wish him a pleasant sojourn in our midst.

The Revival on the Pacific Coast.

A very remarkable state of affairs, says the Pacific Methodist of February 26, exists in the religious circles of San Francisco. A deep religious feeling is moving over the community, shared in alike by Catholic and Protestant. With the advent of Mr. Hammond the congregations of almost all the Protestant churches of the city have united in a series of services which are wonderfully blessed. While this is the case the Catholics are engaged in a "protracted meeting" at St. Mary's cathedral. Great crowds are drawn to listen to the preaching of the Paulist fathers, who are heralded as eloquent and devout men. We have not heard them, but from the reports given by the daily papers their teachings, if heeded, will elevate the classes to which they are directed. The old church has taken many of the "strange" ways of modern times to do her work. "Socialities," or prayer meetings, are common; hymn-books, with words and music pretty nearly as used in our churches, and now "protracted meetings" with popular preaching!

On Sunday last Mr. Hammond commenced his meetings by a service in the afternoon at Dr. Stone's church, especially for children. The house was densely crowded, and the overflow filled the church of Mr. Sowtelle, which is located near by. Both meetings were attended by good results. Since that time "Bible reading" meetings have been held every morning at nine o'clock in Calvary church, and the afternoon given to the children, first at Dr. Stone's church, Tuesday and Wednesday at the Tabernacle, and Thursday and Friday afternoons and Saturday morning at the Howard Street Methodist church.

The movement is one of great power. Christians are blended together in the love of Christ. The "sin of sectarianism" has disappeared. Those huge walls whose tops were covered with spikes and glass, over which no intruder could pass except with dire results, are leveled with the ground. If there are dividing lines, there are also gates and stiles and avenues in which and through which Christians pass praising God. We should be very thankful for such seasons.

We have unfortunately been so closely confined with our own work that we have not been able to attend these meetings sufficiently to satisfy ourself of the practicability of the rather strange order of exercises with which Mr. Hammond carries on the services. Though they are strange, and perhaps in some instances a little revolting, yet we Methodists should be the last to cavil at the methods if the end is attained. Our history as a church is replete with singular manifestations of the grace of God, and most renowned and successful revivalists have been noted for their peculiar and strange methods of attracting the attention of the multitudes. Many now think that our Methodism is losing much of its once powerful influence for good by its conformity with others in dress, church-building and outward observances.

Cheering news comes to us from other quarters. At Hollister there is an uprising. Bro. Overton writes that a cloud of mercy is hanging over the people. All the churches are united in the mighty work. Christians are greatly revived and moving up to the front as never before.

At Gilroy there is a meeting in progress from which we have not heard, but anticipate great things. The report from Dr. Fitzgerald, in this issue, of the work at Santa Rosa fills our hearts with joy. We have heard the meeting at Santa Rosa spoken of on the streets of San Francisco with wonder at its power. Christians, expect much and it shall be given thee.

We have not heard from Bro. Shelton, at Modesta. We are sorry that he has been compelled to labor alone through his protracted effort. His brethren contiguous to him have had their hands on their own plows, and were not able to go to his assistance, but we hope the refreshing showers have satisfied his soul.

Through the kindness of the Rev. S. Dunn, says the Methodist, we have received the Plymouth Morning News of February 6, containing a notice of the death of the Rev. Luke H. Wiseman, of the Wesleyan Conference, and one of the most prominent ministers of the connection. It took place on Wednesday, February 3. Mr. Wiseman was to have preached and conducted the service at the Islington chapel the preceding Sunday. Being attacked with pain and weakness, he went home, leaving the services to be conducted by others. His attack was attributed to indigestion, and excited no apprehensions. He continued his official and literary labors during the two following days, and on Tuesday was seen upon the street. On Wednesday he was seized with spasms of the heart, and died late in the evening. His death was totally unexpected until the moment it took place. Mr. Wiseman was about fifty-five years of age. He was the son of the venerable Mr. Wiseman, of Norwich, a devoted agent in his neighborhood of the Bible Society. After receiving a good education he became private secretary to Sir Fowell Buxton. He received a classical and theological training, with the Methodist ministry in view, at the college at Hoxton, and joined the Conference in 1841. In 1868 he was appointed one of the general secretaries of the Wesleyan Missionary Society. In 1871 he was chosen secretary of the Conference, and in 1872 president. He was the author of works on Christ's Temptation in the Wilderness and Men of Faith. He visited our last General Conference as one of the representatives of the British Conference; and was at one time editor of the Methodist Recorder.

Men differ as to what is right, but all believe that something is right. They differ as to what is wrong, but all believe that something is wrong.

A Song and a Sermon.

I'll tell you a story about a man
Who always came to church in season;
And now my story's begun.
Name me his name not one of you can!
Listen, then, and you'll hear the reason:
You never are there yourselves in season.
And now my story is done.

The song is ended, but the sermon is just going to begin. You will find the text in the Book of Job, passim. That is the only book that the minister feels like reading from at the opening of the service. Even that moving history sometimes fails to meet his case.

"Ye have heard the patience of Job," wrote the Apostle James; but how much we should have heard of it if Job had been a preacher of the gospel, and had been in the habit of opening the worship of the Lord's house on the Sabbath day with one-half of his congregation in their seats, and the rest, by twos and threes, by sixes and sevens, filing in, stepping lightly over the invocation, treading the sentences under their feet, turning the anthem into a tramp chorus, forming ten abreast at the lower end of the nave, and then marching by the right flank straight up the broad aisle and right through the Scripture lesson—how much we should have heard of the patience of Job, if he had had such a trial as this to bear twice every Sunday, the Apostle James nowhere informs us. Possibly the patriarch would have taken his wife's bad advice, and would have blotted the fair record which was made of him on the day when the sons of men came to present themselves before the Lord.

"Satan came also among them," we are told. That seems to mean that he came late. After all the rest had got there his eleven foot came stumping in. Of course that must have been the way. He is the prince of procrastinators, last at every good place, and first at every bad one. Dearly beloved brethren, let us not imitate him when we come to present ourselves before the Lord.

Speaking of satan, we all know who it is that takes the hindmost. Beware lest he gets you on your way to church.

Forehanded people are found among the qua drumana in New England, and we have also read in some of the scientific books of three-handed persons—two hands and a little behindhand. Those who are afflicted in this way do not always seem to be sensible of their deformity. Amputation of this unruly member may be a painful operation, but it ought to be performed for all that. There is many a man—and now and then a woman—whose right hand never offends, but whose behindhand often does. Cut it off, then; it is better to enter into church with two hands than a little behindhand.

Dunn Browne, the joking parson, was troubled in his parish by the tardiness of the worshipers; so, in his opening prayer one day, he laid the matter before the Lord; praying, first for the people who were in their seats in church; then for those who were almost there; then for those who were just starting from home; and finally asking the Lord in his infinite mercy to remember those who were just beginning to get ready to start. Whether this was a prayer of faith may be doubted, but, like that famous elocutionary petition of the late Mr. Everett, it must certainly be pronounced one of the most appropriate prayers ever delivered to any audience.

Jokers and joking aside, there is good reason why we should all be in our seats when the service begins, and no apparent reason why we cannot. We commonly get to the train or the bank in time; our children almost always are at school in time; the great majority of us probably contrive to go to dinner in time; almost the only place where we are regularly and habitually behind time is the house of God. Why should we not be as prompt in our attendance here as elsewhere?

It is a singular fact that postponing the hour of service does not mend matters. "I know you can get here at a quarter to eight," said a minister, in announcing that the evening service would begin thereafter at that hour, instead of half-past seven; "I know you can get here at a quarter to eight, because you have done it regularly for weeks. So our service will commence henceforth at that time." Of course it was eight o'clock the next Sunday evening before the people were all in their seats.

"When the day of Pentecost was fully come," we are told, the hundred and twenty disciples "were all with one accord in one place." That means that they were all there promptly when the meeting began. There was a grand unity of spirit and purpose among them; there were no stragglers or laggards. Every one was in his place waiting for the descent of the heavenly gifts. Prompt attention to matters in which we are deeply interested, prompt attendance in places where we expect some signal favor, we rarely fail to vouchsafe. And not until the interests that summon us to the Lord's house become sufficiently absorbing to compel promptness there, can we expect the same blessing that came down on the day of Pentecost.

How much the worship of the sanctuary is marred by the rustle and movement which fill the house during the first part of every service it would be difficult to say. The attention of the people is distracted, and their devotions are disturbed, and the minister, for his part, finds it hard to keep his mind serene and his heart attuned to heavenly themes while there is so much marching and countermarching of tardy worshipers and attentive ushers on the field before him.

God is not the author of confusion in the churches of the saints, and we have no reason to suppose that he is pleased with it when it is made by the saints themselves.—Advance.

WHATEVER rouses the moral nature, whether it be danger or suffering, or the approach of death, banishes unbelief in a moment.

TIME is gold. Throw not one minute away, but place each one to account.

The Three Annual Conferences in Arkansas.

REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONERS ON THE BOUNDARIES.

The boundaries of the Arkansas, White River and Little Rock Conferences, as agreed upon by the commissioners appointed by the three Conferences, are as follows:

Arkansas Conference shall include that part of the State of Arkansas inclosed by the following boundary line: Beginning at the point where the North Fork of White river crosses the Missouri State line; thence down North Fork to its mouth; thence down White river to the point of White River mountains; thence with said mountains to Miller's Ferry, on Little Red river; thence south with the range of mountains to the head of Palarm creek; thence down said creek to the old Clinton road; thence down said road to Bartlett, on the Little Rock and Fort Smith railroad; and down said road to the crossing of the Cairo and Fultou railroad; and down said road to the railroad bridge; and then up the Arkansas river to the mouth of Petit Jean; thence along the line between Yell and Perry counties, so as to include Perry county; thence in a direct line to the southwest corner of Yell county; thence due west to the western line of the State; and thence with the State line to the beginning.

White River Conference shall be bounded on the east by the Mississippi; on the north by the Missouri State line; on the west by the Arkansas Conference to the head of Palarm creek; thence down said creek to the old Clinton road, and down said road to the Little Rock and Fort Smith railroad to the crossing of the Cairo and Fultou railroad, and then down said road to Baring Cross, on the Arkansas river; on the south by the Cairo and Fulton railroad from the bridge on the Arkansas river, including Argenta, Jacksonville, Cabbot and Austin stations, to the bridge on Cypress bayou, then down said bayou to DesArc bayou, and down said bayou to White river, and down said river to its mouth.

Little Rock Conference shall embrace all that portion of the State of Arkansas not included in the Arkansas and White River Conferences, and a part of Louisiana lying north of Soda lake and west of Red river.—Western Methodist.

THE FOUR GOSPELS IN ONE. By Robert Allen Campbell. Second revised edition. St. Louis: Henry W. Brand & Co., 1875.

This work purports to contain every statement in the four gospels in the exact words of the authorized version. The narrative is consecutive, arranged in chronological order, and exhibits the four gospels in one uninterrupted history. It is arranged in chapters and paragraphs, and has, besides, a table of contents, an index of verses showing the location in the work of every verse in the four gospels. The value of this arrangement of the gospels may be considerable to many readers, especially as exhibiting the order of the events related, and as presenting the entire record as gathered from the several evangelists in a single view. For ourselves, however, we prefer a good reference Bible and Cruden unabridged at our elbow. The volume is a handsome 12mo of 283 pages, faultless in type and binding. Price, $1.50.

AN EFFORT TO ANALYZE THE MORAL IDEA is the title of a pamphlet by Robert D. Allen, superintendent of the Kentucky Military Institute, Farmdale, Kentucky. It is published by the Southern Methodist Publishing House, Nashville, Tennessee. We have received a copy, but have not yet found time to examine it.

VICK'S FLORAL GUIDE No. 2, for 1875, has been received. It is a beautiful pamphlet, and of interest and value to all who cultivate flowers. Published by James Vick, Rochester, New York.

THE American Artisan for March has been received. This is one of the most valuable publications we know of. It is handsomely illustrated, and filled with information.

THE American Agriculturist for March has been received. It is a fine number of this always superb publication, profusely illustrated, and abounding in information.

WE ARE indebted to James A. Gresham, proprietor and publisher, 92 Camp street, for the March number of the New Orleans Medical and Surgical Journal.

THE Southern Cultivator for March has been received. It is an excellent number of this sterling publication. W. L. Jones, editor and proprietor, Athens, Georgia.

APPLETON'S RAILWAY AND STEAM NAVIGATION GUIDE for March brings all information for travelers up to date. A valuable publication.

THE Sunday school periodicals of the Southern Methodist Publishing House, Nashville, for April, have come to hand.

CHURCH'S MUSICAL VISITOR for March has been received. Published by John Church & Co., Cincinnati.

MORTON'S MONTHLY HOME AND SCHOOL for February has been received.

THE Gardener's Monthly for March has been received.

THE King of Belgium has established an annual prize of $5,000 to be awarded for the best works or investigations upon certain determined subjects. The competition is confined exclusively to Belgians, except in every fourth year, when the citizens of any nation may compete. The first general concourse takes place in 1881, when the above-mentioned sum will be awarded for the best work on methods of improving harbors on low and sandy coasts, similar to those of Belgium.

THE highest obedience in the spiritual life is to be able to always and in all things to say: "Thy will be done."

THE MAN WHO STOPS HIS PAPER. Philip Gilbert Hamerton, in his admirable papers on "Intellectual Life," thus talks to the man who "stopped his paper:" "Newspapers are to the civilized world what the daily house-talk is to the members of the household: they keep our daily interest in each other; they save us from the evils of isolation. To live as a member of the great white race of men, the race that has filled Europe and America, and colonized or conquered whatever other territory it has been pleased to occupy—to share from day to day its cares, its thoughts and inspirations—it is necessary that every man should read his paper. Why are the French peasants so bewildered and aud at sea? It is because they never read a newspaper. And why are inhabitants of the United States, though scattered over a territory fourteen times the area of France, so much more capable of concerted action, so much more alive and modern, so much more interested in new discoveries of all kinds, and capable of selecting and utilizing the best of them? It is because the newspapers penetrate everywhere; and even the lonely dweller on the prairie or in the forest is not intellectually isolated from the great currents of public life which flow through the telegraph and press."

MARRIED.

WAILES—OORTON.—At the residence of the bride's father, in Waterproof, Louisiana, February 10, 1875, by Rev. C. W. Carter, Mr. Edmond W. Wailes to Miss Mary Ahlio Oorton, all of Tensas parish, Louisiana.

BURGESS—WILLIS.—At the residence of the bride's father, in Baton Rouge, Louisiana, February 3, 1875, by Rev. John Wilkinson, Mr. George Burgess to Miss Anna Willis, both of Baton Rouge, Louisiana.

GILBERT—WILLIAMS.—By the Rev. H. O. White, at the residence of the bride's mother, twelve miles below Monroe, Louisiana, February 21, 1875, Mr. F. T. Gilbert to Miss Annie Williams.

MORGAN—KENNEDY.—By the Rev. J. V. Pointer, at the residence of Dr. Hopkins, Vermillionville, Lafayette parish, Louisiana, February 18, 1875, Mr. Alexander Morgan to Miss Kate Kennedy.

PAY POSTAGE.—Subscribers whose subscriptions have been paid at the old rates—viz.: two dollars per year—and whose subscriptions run into 1875, are required under the new postage law, which goes into effect January 1, to pay postage at the office of mailing. The subscription price hereafter includes the postage. Two cents per month each month that the subscription has to run, will be sufficient to pay for the ADVOCATE.

RISKS ON REMITTANCES.—Money may be sent to the publisher of the ADVOCATE in payment of subscriptions, in amounts not exceeding ten dollars, by registered letter, at his risk. Any amounts may be sent by express or postoffice money order at his risk, provided that in all the above cases the expense of remitting be borne by the person who remits. Otherwise it will be at their own risk.

THE attention of those in want of bells for churches, schools, etc., is called to the advertisement of Vanduzen & Tift, of Cincinnati, Ohio. Full descriptive catalogues, with prices, etc., will be sent free on application to them.

COTTON PLANTERS will do well to give attention to the advertisement of the Louisiana Oil Company in another column.

BECKWITH SEWING MACHINE.—In our supplement of this issue will be found a cut of the Beckwith Sewing Machine, advertised by our worthy and excellent neighbor, Edward Thompson, Esq., at No. 90 Baronne street, New Orleans. These machines can be obtained with or without the treadle, enabling those whose health is likely to be injured by the use of the treadle to avoid it by getting a machine with the crank. To us the machine seems to be simple, convenient and strongly constructed in those parts on which there is particular strain. We have heard many testimonials in favor of it, and can assure those interested that Mr. Thompson sustains a high reputation as a gentleman of honor and integrity.

HIWASSEE COLLEGE.—We are glad to learn that through the indomitable energy and vigorous enterprise of its president, Rev. J. H. Brunner, the above institution is in a flourishing condition. Seven young gentlemen among the students are preparing for the ministry, some of whom will enter into the active service next fall. Thirteen States are represented in its patronage. For information address Rev. J. H. Brunner, president, Hiwassee College postoffice, Tennessee.

CARRIAGES, HARNESS, ETC.—It would be difficult to suit the taste or meet the views of any one needing a carriage, buggy or child's carriage who could not be satisfied with selections they could make from the vast and admirably assorted stock of Messrs. J. A. Lum & Co., 162 Gravier and 13 Union street. The character of this firm has been too long established and too well and favorably known to need commendation from us. See advertisement in another column.

LOUISVILLE, NASHVILLE & GREAT SOUTHERN RAILROAD.—Persons contemplating trips to the East and North during the coming season will do well to consider the advantages of the above-named route. The rolling stock is in fine condition, the condition of the road-bed along the line has been much improved, the scenery presents much variety, and we have found the conductors and employes on this route uniformly courteous and obliging.

CLOTHING.—The old and reliable house of Pierson & Hews, at 13 and 15 Camp street, has lost none of its reputation for liberal terms and fair dealing. Those who wish to deal with honorable and high-toned gentlemen will find in this firm persons suited to their taste. We should feel as sure of being treated justly if they were filling an order for us when we were a thousand miles distant as if we were present. See their advertisement.

STEAM SASH FACTORY.—Messrs. Roberts & Co., at 299, 301, 303, 305 and 307 Gravier street, have long enjoyed a large city and country patronage, and we know of no firm more deserving. The work which they turn out may be relied upon as faithfully executed and well finished. Our country friends may send their orders with full confidence that satisfaction will be given.

FIREMEN'S INSURANCE COMPANY. The above-named company, recently chartered, we are told, meets with much favor. The character of the directors is a guarantee for the judicious and cautious management of its affairs, and we predict for it a prosperous career. They have opened at the corner of Camp and Gravier streets, and are ready to take risks.

SOAP.—There can be no longer any doubt that the soap manufactured by J. H. Keller, Esq., and advertised in another column, is of excellent quality; indeed, after trying it for several years, we are convinced that there is no better, and we commend it to families and country merchants.

RESTAURANT.—Families who wish meals furnished at their apartments or residences, or who have occasion to provide wedding suppers or special dinners, will do well to read the advertisement of the restaurant at No. 72 St. Peter street. Meals and lunches given at the house.

EXTRA OLIVE SOAP.—We call the attention of our readers to the advertisement of C. A. French, Esq., 11 Peters street, of Proctor & Gamble's well-known Extra Olive Soap, in such extensive use and so well known among grocers and consumers.

ALL SEASONS RESTAURANT.—P. G. Simon, Esq., at No. 155 Chartres street, continues the old and popular restaurant, called the Four Seasons, under the above style. See his liberal rates and offers.

ANY ONE wishing the services of a notary is referred to the card of Mr. William H. Seymour, 79 Customhouse street. Mr. Seymour is also commissioner of deeds for Mississippi, Texas and other States.

SAW MILL proprietors will find it to their interest to notice the advertisement of William Cleland, 222 Magazine street, New Orleans.

NOW.

"There is a good time coming, boys;"
So runs the hopeful song;
Such is the poetry of youth;
When life and hope are strong.
But when these buoyant days are passed,
Age cries: "How changed are men!
Things were not so when I was young,
The best of times was then."

"There is a good time coming, boys;"
The truth we will allow;
But, waiting not for brighter days,
There is a good time now.
Why not improve the present, then,
Where'er the future lead,
And let each passing moment's page
Bear proof of thought and deed?

"There is a good time coming, boys;"
And many a one has passed;
For each has had his own good time,
And will have to the last.
Then do thy work, while lingers youth
With freshness on its brow,
Still mindful of life's greatest truth:
The best of times is now.

Grandpa Goodale Papers.

MY DEAR CHILDREN: Charlie says that I must tell you the story about "How Barney Milked the Bays' Nest" to-night; and as my hand shakes a little—for it is not quite so steady as it was twenty years ago—Tom, who has grown to be quite a stout boy, and is in fractions, says he will write it down as I tell it. So, as the old soldier used to say when he was drilling a squad of boys in whistling, "Prepare to pucker!"

You must first know who Barney was. Well, when I was a boy (all my stories seem somehow to begin: "When I was a boy") I had an uncle named Jabez Snow, who used to make long voyages in a ship of which he was the captain, and he sometimes brought home some very queer things from Calcutta and Liverpool. I remember he once brought home a pair of little wee ponies, not much larger than the dog Buck, who thought he killed the bear, and a little chariot in which he used to ride up from Bucksport to see us. Well, once he brought home the funniest thing of all—a real live Irishman, whose name was Barney; and, as he didn't know what else to do with him, he sent him up to "The Farm," as they used to call my father's place, and father hired him to work. I remember the first night he was there we boys caught a lot of fireflies or lightning-bugs, as we children called them, because they kept showing, after dark, a kind of light like a very small flash of lightning. Tom, who has been studying natural history, says their real name is Elateridæ, which means elastic, and that this name was given them because they can jump so. Tom says that in South America there is a variety of these insects which grow very large, and that the ladies wear them in their hair at night, instead of diamonds, and they have to be fed on sugar-cane and bathed twice a day—I mean the insects, not the ladies. Funny jewels! Don't you think? Well, as I said, we boys caught ever so many of these insects—for we had found out, in some way, that they do not have them in Ireland—and we put them in Barney's room the first night he was there, and then we hid to see what he would do. Barney's room was up stairs in the corn-house, and we hid behind some barrels, where we waited till nearly nine o'clock, almost choking with fun. We had put some molasses on an old hat and coat that had been used for a scare-crow, and had stuck the fire-flies all over them, and hung them on Barney's bed-post. After we had gotten very tired of waiting we at last heard Barney coming up the stairs to go to bed. Then we kept very still and heard him open the door, and then he gave a shriek, and rushed down stairs yelling as if some demon was after him; and when we went down and asked him what was the matter he said:

"An' sure it was a devil I saw in me room, wid fire comin' out of his two eyes; an sorra a bit will I sleep in that room at all, at all."

And we had to tell him about our trick, and show him the hat and coat all stuck over with the little bugs, before we could get him to go back; and then he persisted in calling the fire-fly "the Devil's Bast."

"There, now, grandpa," says Charlie, "mamma is calling us to go to bed, and you haven't told us about the 'Bays' Nest' yet."

"Never mind, my little man; you know I have to talk slowly, so Tom can write it down. We will try again to-morrow night."

GRANDPA GOODALE.

The Foundation of Two Old Myths.

Stop, Bright-eyes! Don't skip my story, because foundation is a dull-looking word, and you do not know what myths mean! I want to tell you something wonderful and true. We'll look in "Webster" and find out about "myths."

A myth is a fabulous or imaginary statement—a tale of some extraordinary personage or country.

For example, Baron Munchausen's stories, and Gulliver's adventures among the giants of Brobdignag and the little people of Lilliput, are all myths.

The old story of a race of pigmies in Central Africa, who every year waged fierce wars with the cranes, has been supposed to be equally fabulous; but recent travelers in Africa tell us that there actually is, in Central Africa, a tribe of little people about four feet high. They have large heads, and sleuder necks and bodies. Their lower jaw and chin protrude, giving the face an ape-like expression, not at all handsome. They are very agile; even the old men will dance in a wonderful way for a long time, and they are noted for their fights with wild elephants. All the tribes of the interior hunt the elephant, but these dwarfs are the most successful. The skin of the elephant is so thick on its back and sides that it takes a long time to destroy him with their weapons, but these little men will dart underneath the elephant and wound him in the belly, and then get out of the way of the maddened creature in safety.

Schweinfurth tells about being surrounded by a troop of impudent boys, as he supposed, who danced about him with strange grimaces, and took aim at him with their darts and arrows, then retreated as suddenly as they had appeared. He found out afterward that he had really been in danger, for these pigmies were not boys, but full-grown men—warriors well trained to fight.

He did not succeed in penetrating into their country, but the king gave him one little man who was his companion for months, and of whom he took great care, hoping to bring him home with him. He killed himself, however, by over-eating, a fault of which it was impossible to cure him.

DuChaillu has written a book about this nation, and others have seen and written about them; so we must acknowledge that Herodotus and other ancient travelers had some foundation for their stories.

You've heard some of the old Greek and Roman myths; perhaps you've read in Hawthorne's Tanglewood Tales how Cadmus sowed the dragon's teeth and reaped a harvest of armed men; and of the cruise of the Argonauts in quest of the golden apples of the Hesperides. You've heard of Scylla and Charybdis. Do you remember about the sirens, the singing mermaids, who sang so sweetly that all who heard them forgot their homes and were allured to destruction? Wise Ulysses made all his men stop their ears with cotton, and caused himself to be bound firmly to the mast when they sailed by; so he heard the song and escaped destruction.

Modern science has found a foundation for these old stories of the sirens in the musical sounds produced by certain fishes.

You thought fishes were mute? Few people know that some sorts can sing, though Aristotle wrote about it centuries ago.

Lately scientific men have been making extensive observations, and have found that, out of the more than three thousand species that exist, fifty-two are known to produce sounds. Some of these make grunting or grating or humming noises, but some utter very sweet sounds.

The fishermen told Sir J. E. Tennet, late Governor of Ceylon, that certain sounds resembling the faint, sweet notes of an Æolian harp proceeded from the bottom of a neighboring lake; that they and their fathers were familiar with these sounds made by two species of shell-fish. They called them "crying-shells." So Sir Tennet took a boat and went out on the lake, one moonlight night, and thus describes the sounds he heard: "They came up from the water like the gentle thrill of a musical chord, or the faint vibrations of a wine-glass when its rim is rubbed by a moistened finger. It was not one sustained note, but a multitude of tiny sounds, each clear and distinct in itself, the sweetest treble mingling with the lowest bass. On applying the ear to the wood work of the boat, the vibration was greatly increased in volume." The sounds varied considerably at different points, and they did not hear them on all parts of the lake. Did you ever rub the edge of a thin goblet round and round, after dipping your finger in water? If not, ask your mother to let you try it some time after dinner, that you may know how fishes' music sounds.

A party of five intelligent persons heard music in the harbor of Bombay, described as "like the protracted booming of a distant bell, the dying cadence of an Æolian harp, the note of a pitch-pipe, or tuning-fork, or other long-drawn-out musical note." The fish that was said to produce these sounds closely resembled in size and shape the fresh-water perch. The sounds rose from the surface of the water all round the boat.

Singing fish seem to be almost as wonderful as mermaids, but I assure you on the authority of M. Dufosse, an eminent French naturalist, that this fish story is a true story.—Work and Play.

BERGMEAL.—A Norwegian boy, with eyes as blue as wood violets, and hair of the pale gold color of a daffy that has grown in the shade, lately told a young lady, in my hearing, about a very queer sort of flour that he had seen at home, and in a few other countries—Tuscany, in Italy, for instance. It is called bergmeal, he said (or bergmehl, from the German berg, mountain, and mehl, meal.) To give a loaf of bread made from this flour would be almost literally to give a stone for bread; for the bergmeal, our boy said, is not made from grain, but from a very fine white or cream-colored powder, mainly composed of flinty shells, so very small that one square inch of the powder is said to contain millions of them.

"Is this bread good, and can one live upon it?" the young lady asked the Norwegian lad.

He shook his head rather sadly and said: "No, it is not good, and one could not live upon it alone; but in hard times, when grain-flour is very scarce and costly, the poor people go out upon the mountains and gather this powder to mix with grain-flour, to make it last longer."

He said that there was something else in the bergmeal besides the particles of flinty shells, and that this something had a little nourishment in it; but the main thing is that the mountain-flour increases the bulk of the food, and even that is an advantage in times of famine.

I was glad that the poor people of Norway could get this bergmeal when they could not get good grain-flour; but I would much rather we should send them a few ship-loads of wheat or rye or buckwheat or Indian corn. Wouldn't you, my dears? St. Nicholas.

A LITTLE HELP.—A company of men were pushing a boat into the water, but it stuck so fast that they couldn't move it. "Another pound," said one, "and it will go." "I can push a pound," answered a little boy. He did, and she was soon afloat. So you see a little boy can do something.

SOME MOURN more the shame which sin brings than the sin which brings the shame.

Farm, Garden and Household.

Shropshire Sheep.

The London Field gives the English view of this breed and shows its rapid progress:

Although a comparatively recent breed, these valuable sheep are widely distributed, and possess many sterling qualities, which it is the object of the present paper to describe.

Points.—We know of no breed so prolific; the increase in all cases is to a certain extent, and often materially, influenced by the nature of the land, as yielding nourishing or inferior food. On an average, if the ewes are well cared for, before and during the time the ram is with them, at least fifty per cent. may be looked for; and when Shropshire are crossed upon long-wool ewes, the increase is much greater, as the following facts sufficiently prove: On a strong, poor farm we purchase forty Ballshire ewes every autumn—i. e., a description of border Leicester with a slight Cheviot cross—and serve them with a Shropshire ram, either a shearling or a ram lamb. In 1872 thirty-six ewes produced seventy-eight lambs, all sold fat. This season the forty ewes produced eighty-two lambs; but owing to unfavorable causes we lost ten lambs, or such portion of the same as have not been already treated with mint sauce. This prolific tendency is a point of great importance, for it is not with the Shropshire as with some of the larger breeds: that a fine single lamb is more esteemed than a double. The ewes are good mothers, and can do justice to their offspring; moreover, it is always possible to assist nature by nutritious diet. Next, the Shropshire is a hardy sheep, suitable for a large range of soils, standing moisture better than severe cold, and capable of close folding without sensible loss of size. The yield, both of mutton and wool, is far greater than from the Southdown or other short-wool. Hampshire may arrive at a greater weight, but they require more time, the proportion of bone and offal is greater, and the wool much less. It is no uncommon event to find a flock of Shropshire sheep, on good land, yielding an average of six and one-half to seven pounds a fleece. The quality of the meat, both from the fineness of texture, the presence of fat in the tissues, and the rich, dark color, is fully equal to the best Southdowns. And for all these reasons the Shropshire sheep are rent-payers, and deservedly and increasingly popular. They suit the moist climate of Ireland remarkably well, and not a few buyers from the Emerald Isle may be seen round Mr. Pierce's ring at Shrewsbury. With generous treatment from their earliest days—and such treatment is surely profitable as well—Shropshire sheep can be brought out in May to weigh from eighteen to twenty pounds a quarter. Cases could be cited where much more has been done, but we speak of what is possible where the land is heavily stocked. They bear close folding remarkably well, and for all these reasons take rank as the most important short-wool breed of the present day.

The Shropshire sheep of the present day exhibit much of the quality of the Down, with considerably more size; the features are rather longer, of a uniform dark but not black tint, the eyes full and large, the forehead moderately flat and well-wooled, the ears rather large and thin, standing well out from the head. Much improvement in symmetry has taken place of late years. Formerly the shoulder was frequently upright, the spine not straight, the top far from level, and forequarter generally light; now the best-bred sheep are as true-grown as the Downs. The character of the wool is of great importance, especially where the climate is moist. An open condition of wool is to be deprecated. The staple should be fine and close, with which a good weight is quite possible.

CARROTS.—The cultivation of carrots is worthy of the consideration of farmers engaged in the production of milk and butter, as they increase the flow of the former and the flavor of the latter. For these he should also plow early and manure well, but should give the weeds time to sprout and be destroyed by after-cultivation, before sowing the seed. Carrot seed should be soaked twenty-four hours, and sowed with a seed sower at the rate of two pounds of seed per acre. Avoid sowing more seed than is necessary, as the labor of thinning is thereby greatly increased. From early May to the tenth of June, hoeing the ground, and not the weeds, should be the motto. A crop of flat turnips may be grown between the rows of carrots late in summer, without injury to the carrots. The turnip seed should be drilled in the last week in July. We prefer carrots which are short and thick, rather than those which are excessively long, as they are easier to harvest, and weigh more to the bushel. Carrots should be harvested late in October or early in November. Cut the tops off with sharp hoes, and feed to horses and cattle. Then run a plow close to the rows, after which the carrots may be pulled by hand and thrown in piles to dry. Carrots mixed with mangolds make a good feed for horses, once a day.

IMPROVING COTTON SEED.—In 1868 or 1869 I commenced experimenting on cotton seed. I tried several new varieties—Dickson, Holmes, Peeler and Maning—none of which was exactly to my liking, and I commenced selecting for myself. I commenced with the Dickson variety. My object was to get the short lint, prolific. I took my sack, went over the field, and when I came to a stalk that suited me I picked the best bolls on it, and saved a small amount of seed, planted a small patch and saved the seed, and soon got enough to plant a considerable patch. In this way I continued to improve my seed until I got them too much to my notion—the limbs short and the bolls all in a bunch. I threw them away, and began in the same way to get a larger boll and longer limb, and I find by experiment that I can improve my seed to my liking. I prefer the Peeler to any kind that is on the market. It has large bolls, fine lint and long limbs. There is no use of farmers paying large prices for improved seed; if they will but take a little pains they can have any kind of cotton they like.—Correspondent of State Journal.

PRUNING NEWLY-PLANTED PEACH TREES.—I have lately planted against a brick wall a few maiden peaches and nectarines, mostly of strong growth. They are at present full size, as they came from the nursery. When ought they to be cut down, and how?

In the pruning of newly-planted fruit-trees we advise the operation to be deferred until such time as it may be observed that the buds have begun to move. Then it may be safely inferred that the roots are in action, and that the plant has taken to its new quarters. In transplanting trees, however young, there is a considerable check given, and a disorganization of the system of the plant effected. Its vital forces are considerably weakened, and the sap does not flow with the same vigor. The flow of the sap is always strongest toward the terminal buds; therefore the removal of these terminal buds by pruning, while the tree is yet in its weakened state through removal, is unwise, and not unfrequently results in the loss of the plant. But when we allow the sap once to get into motion, and to flow in its own most easy and natural way, pruning may be effected without danger.—Gardeners' Chronicle.

USEFUL INFORMATION.—Castor oil is an excellent thing to soften leather.

Cream of tartar rubbed upon soiled white kid gloves cleanses them well.

A solution of cyanide of potassium is the best poison to kill insects of any kind.

A pint of mustard seed put in a barrel of cider will preserve it sweet for several months.

A mixture of oil and ink is a good thing to clean kid boots with; the first softens and the latter blackens them.

A simple remedy for removing freckles is a pint of sour milk and a small quantity of horseradish. Let the mixture stand over night, and use it as a wash three times a day until the freckles disappear.

The leaves of geranium are an excellent application for cuts; when the skin is rubbed off, and other wounds of the same kind. One or two leaves must be bruised and applied on linen to the part, and the wound will become cleatrized in a very short time.

All sorts of vessels and utensils may be purified from long-retained smells of every kind, in the easiest and most perfect manner, by rinsing them out well with charcoal powder, after the grosser impurities have been scoured off with sand and potash.—Ohio Farmer.

HOW TO GET GOOD RASPBERRIES. Raspberries require very rich land, and it is not too late to fork in some well-rotted manure between the rows. If this cannot be obtained, sow about three pounds of some good artificial manure to the square rod, and work it into the soil with a pronged hoe. A spade should never be used among the raspberries. Keep the ground as clean and mellow as possible. Weeds pump up large quantities of water out of the soil. Suffer none to grow. And recollect that a raspberry sucker that is not needed is simply a weed, and should be treated accordingly. You want four strong suckers to each hill to form canes for next year. All the rest, unless needed to form new beds, should be killed as soon as they show themselves. This is a very important point in raising large, delicious raspberries. As dry weather approaches, the land having been repeatedly stirred to kill weeds, mulch the ground thickly, to prevent the evaporation of moisture.

CALIFORNIA WOOL.—The San Francisco Wool Exchange places the California wool crop for 1874 at four hundred million pounds, and predicts a large increase for 1875. It is cause for regret that Southern farmers are so little inclined to keep sheep and make wool a great Southern staple, and more profitable than cotton. California, Arizona, New Mexico, Texas, and a few other Western States and Territories are extending sheep husbandry and increasing their wealth. But the old planting States appear to believe that this branch of industry will not prosper among them, no matter how earnestly it is pursued. Co-operation is needed in the matter of protecting sheep from dogs, and in seeding land to grass for sheep-walks and pastures. Our grazing old fields and mountain ranges are susceptible of great improvement. We should not wait for English or Europeans to seed our wild lands to grass for raising sheep, cattle or stock of any kind.

CURRANTS IN THE SOUTH.—Mrs. A. S. G., Hollywood, Arkansas, wishes to know whether the currant will do well in this climate. We are compelled to answer that after trying some twenty-five kinds we have found none to succeed as well as they do in the Northern and Middle States. With three or four—the Cherry, Victoria, White Grape, Macrocarpa and Black Naples—we have been partially successful, under the semi-shade of trees or on the north side of picket fences. In the cool soils of middle and northern Arkansas we should plant the varieties above named with a pretty confident expectation that they would be a success. Our experiments have been made a good way further South.—Our Home Journal.

BREAKFAST DISHES.—In cooking oat meal, hominy, wheaten grits, cracked wheat, or any of those nice breakfast dishes, cook it in a covered tin dish in a kettle of boiling water. In this manner there is no danger of scorching. Corn-starch pudding, sea-moss farina, and all other articles mixed with milk, can be cooked in the same way.

One of the best remedies known for the speedy cure of

DYSPEPSIA,

Loss of Appetite, Sour Stomach, Flatulence, Heartburn, Nausea, Fluttering of the Heart, Fainting Sensations, Sudden Flushes of Heat, Depression of Spirits or Melancholy, Water Brash, and Chronic or Nervous Debility. They are Diuretic, Tonic, Alterative and Stimulant. They perfectly eradicate all Bilious disorders arising from a foul stomach, strengthening the system and regulating the functions of the Liver.

Any one suffering with Weak Nerves, Deranged Liver, Kidney Complaint, Loss of Appetite, Fever and Ague, or any of the diseases or symptoms enumerated above, can be materially benefited and entirely cured by the use of these Bitters.

FOR FEMALES.

It is an established fact that fully one-half of the females are in bad health; or, in other words, never feel well. Many suffer with inward weakness. They feel languid, devoid of energy, extremely nervous, and have no appetite. To this class the Renovating Bitters are especially recommended. Such patients should resort to the use of these Bitters, the invariable result of which will be a strong and healthy constitution, a disappearance of all nervousness, a good appetite and a perfect restoration to health.

Thousands have testified to the merits of these Bitters. I would strongly advise all suffering with the above-named complaints to try them and be convinced.

Full directions accompany each bottle. Price, $1 per bottle, or six bottles for $5.

How Woman Headed the Table.

A writer says: "In Elizabethan England, when gallimawfreys had given way to the substantial fare of our later cookery, it was the custom at private dinners to place the principal joints and masses of meat at the upper end of the table, above the salt, so that the chief guests could see clearly the best of the good cheer, and also appropriate the choicest cuts before the inferior folk below the joint of honor were served. Fashion having thus decided that the "carving should be done on the table," the ladies were invited to the top of the table, not out of gallantry, but in order that they should do the work which could no longer be executed conveniently by professional carvers. It may cost the reader a struggle to admit that our ancestors had no more chivalric purpose in view when they promoted woman to her proper place at the festal board, but there is no doubt as to the fact. The new ordering of places was the result of masculine selfishness and insolence rather than masculine gallantry. Just as in medieval society the lady of the house rendered service to her guests by discharging the functions of a gentle serving woman, in preparing dishes for their enjoyment, and even in bringing them to table with her own hands, so in Elizabethan life she went up to the top of her table and seated herself among the first guests, in order that she might serve them as a carver. At the same time the number of 'great pieces' requiring several carvers she brought other ministering ladies to the upper end of the table, where the grand joints were exhibited. Having been thus called to the top of the table for her lord's convenience, instead of her own dignity, the mistress of the house soon made it a point of honor to occupy the place which had in the first instance been conceded to her as a servant rather than as principal lady. Ere long, with her characteristic cleverness in making the best of things, and stating her own case in the way most agreeable to her self-love, she regarded her carver's stool as a throne of state, and affected to preside over the company, though the terms of her commission authorized her to help them to food."

MIGRATION OF BIRDS.—A recent correspondent presents the novel hypothesis that the migratory flight of birds is an entirely involuntary act. The argument is that at or about a certain period of the year, when a strong southern wind prevails in an upper stratum of the air, a subtle atmospheric change, resulting from it, acts upon the muscles of birds in such a way as to make them fly. Their wings beat as naturally as their hearts, and they cannot help going. Rising up into the swift current of air, they are borne along it as long as the spasm lasts, which generally is long enough to carry most of them to warmer climates, although multitudes recover a little too soon and perish in the sea. Some experiments made upon migratory birds in captivity lend plausibility to the theory. Kept in cages covered with silk to protect them from injury, these birds have been observed, at the season of migration, to be affected with a paroxysm of flight which continued through a period answering in length to the time occupied by birds in their semi-annual journeys. When the paroxysm was over the birds fell to the ground, began preening their plumage, and conducting themselves as if they had reached a new home after an extended journey. The experiments were made in both England and Africa with similar results.

Cotemporaneous with the publication of this theory, Runeberg, the Swedish poet, announces the fanciful conceit that the birds are impelled to migrate by a longing for light. It has been supposed by ornithologists that birds leave their summer haunts at the approach of winter because their food is exhausted or disappears under the snow, and they are compelled not only by cold, but by hunger to go south, where they can enjoy comfortable warmth and sustenance; but Runeberg declares that "the bird of passage is of noble birth; he bears a motto, and his motto is: 'Lux mea dux.'"

A CURE FOR SEA-SICKNESS.—Dr. Giraldes has published an account of the means by which he avoided seasickness during two passages to England and back. He was at Boulogne last June, en route for London. He obtained some sirup of chloral, put himself into a quiet corner, and took his sirup directly as the vessel was in motion, when, although his fellow-passengers experienced the usual unpleasant consequences, he arrived at Folkstone without having suffered the least inconvenience. The same results were obtained on the return voyage, but he increased the amount of chloral. He had again occasion to cross the channel at the end of September by the night-boat from Calais to Dover, and, thinking with reason that the sea would be rougher at that season than usual, he had a draft made up, composed of chloral, 3 grammes (145 grains;) distilled water, 50 grammes; gooseberry sirup, 60 grammes. French essence of peppermint, 2 drops. He took half of the draught as the vessel left the harbor, and arrived at Dover without having suffered in the least from seasickness, while his companions were in the usual condition of prostrate misery. A very heavy sea was running.—London Medical Journal.

LET afflictions be ever so many, yet they are not more than thy mercies; nor so many as they might have been had God consulted with thy sins, with thy deserts, or with his own justice.

THE EIGHTH WONDER OF THE WORLD IS THE LADY CHEAP JOHN,
MRS. D. J. LOEWENSTEIN,
519.....MAGAZINE STREET.....519
Who has sold out her damaged stock of BOOTS, SHOES AND HATS, and is receiving an extensive stock of NEW GOODS, now arriving direct from the best manufacturers of the North, East and West. Having been carefully selected for this market, and bought for cash, they will be sold at astonishingly low prices—not to be beaten in this city. Then come and see the wonder, which will cost nothing, but you will carry away more Shoes and Boots, for less money, than you imagine. Do not fail to come. Look out for the sign of the WHITE LION. Orders from the country promptly attended to. de17 1om

FOUR SEASONS RESTAURANT.—JOHN ROSSI, proprietor of this old and favorite house, announces to his friends that he has removed to No. 111 Chartres street, between St. Louis and Conti streets, where, with enlarged premises and increased facilities, he will give them the best the market affords, at the same low prices as heretofore. Private Dining-Rooms up stairs. Also comfortably furnished rooms at reasonable rates. Thankful for the liberal patronage bestowed upon him in the past, he asks for a continuance of the same favors. ja21 3m

New Orleans Markets.

From the New Orleans Price Current.

The river is 9 feet 5 inches below high-water mark.

COTTON.—The following are the arrivals since the fifth instant:

Mississippi river and bayous	5,617
Red river	826
Ouachita river	2,303
Railroads	2,116
Lake	9
Mobile	1,835
Texas	392
Total	13,046

On Saturday, under the influence of a rather discouraging telegram from Liverpool, the market opened with a fair inquiry, mostly from buyers who claimed further concessions, which factors would not admit, but the sales during the morning, nevertheless, reached 2,000 bales, after which, under light receipts at the ports, factors exhibited increased confidence, and the market assumed greater steadiness and firmness. Among the sales we noticed low middling at 15@15¼c., and barely middling at 15¾c. The movement was checked during the morning by rainy weather. The entire sales embraced 4,350 bales. On Monday the market was in a somewhat anomalous condition, the bulk of the stock and especially all desirable kinds, being held even above Saturday's rates, while buyers refused to go on unless at further concessions, and factors were compelled to give way about ⅛c. to effect sales of lists on which they were instructed to realize. On the other hand, buyers were unable to fill orders for desirable descriptions without paying outside rates, or a fraction more. The sales embraced 3,600 bales. On Tuesday the same features were exhibited, with a continued tendency in favor of buyers, at least for all lists on which factors were instructed to realize, and 3,250 bales changed hands at irregular prices, closing at a further partial falling off of ⅛c.

The above makes an aggregate for the past three days of 11,300 bales, against 19,200 for the corresponding time last week and 18,853 the week before.

The receipts proper at this port since the first of September, exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas, are 875,277 bales, against 1,025,914 bales to the same date last year, and the decrease in the receipts at all the ports up to the latest mail dates, as compared with last year, is 129,747 bales. The decrease by the reports per telegraph is 137,145—3,035,293 against 3,172,438. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same date last year, there is an increase of 89,113 bales to Great Britain, and a decrease of 37,147 to France and 22,003 to other foreign ports. Advertisers' Directory

OF THE

NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

Alphabetically Arranged Under the Heads of the Business or Articles Advertised.

NOTE.—We take no advertisements except from those who we have good reason to believe are respectable and reliable. The publisher urges his solicitor and agents to seek the advertisements of the most worthy and reliable representatives in every branch of business, and not to apply to or accept business from persons of doubtful character. We have refused business to the extent of thousands of dollars each year for want of satisfactory information in reference to applicants. We think we may safely claim for the list below that it embraces, as a rule, the very best men and firms in the different branches represented.

SHADINES—SHADINES.

TO THE PUBLIC.

Five years since, after previous years of experience in the propagation and preservation of Shadines, or young shad, we first introduced our fish to the American people.

Shadines are put up in hermetically-sealed tin boxes, perfectly boneless, in a mild, pleasing, appetizing sauce, palatable to all, free from all (so objectionable in sardines,) relishing only the natural richness of the shad, and ready for the table at all times—for dinner, lunch or evening meal—by merely opening the box. A daily want for every family during Lent.

Bear in mind, we are the original and only packers of Shadines, and every genuine box has the letters H. & C. pressed on each side.

Muscular Christianity.

Both the Old and New Testaments inculcate this general idea of the care of the body, that it shall not be marred or disfigured, of course, with the idea that the health shall not be so far destroyed as to impair our usefulness. Yes, it is a "reasonable service" to make this body, so far as it is in our power, an appropriate residence for the indwelling of that blessed Spirit. But, oh, what a filthy abode it sometimes has! What a condescension when it dwells, if it really does, in a body saturated with ardent spirits, or with its twin sister, the vile weed—tobacco. Is it not an insult, a downright insult, to invite that pure Spirit to dwell in such an abode?

The body and soul are so intimately connected, each influencing the other, that it may be that we sometimes mistake "spiritual darkness" for a morbid or torpid liver, or a deranged and dyspeptic stomach. If it is not true, as a popular writer has said, that "a dyspeptic stomach is an abomination in the sight of God," it is manifest that a dyspeptic, outwardly, at least, is not as good a Christian as he otherwise might be. He, like the one stimulated by spirits or narcotized by tobacco, after the reaction, is petulant, impatient, morose and unforgiving—the necessary and uniform results of such conditions. While grief, anger, fear and undue excitement impair and even arrest digestion, it is a reasonable inference that the conditions of the body must affect the mental and moral state to the same extent.

We also learn that "the body is for the Lord, and the Lord for the body." In accordance with this thought, Paul, using as an illustration the ancient Olympic games, in which the combatants trained themselves, practicing a great deal of self-denial, asks: "Know ye not that they which run in a race run all, but one receiveth the prize?" adding: "So run that ye may obtain." He argues that if those rude men, but little elevated above the brutes, could practice so much self-denial, train themselves so thoroughly, just to obtain a "corruptible crown," the followers of the meek and lowly Jesus may well practice a similar self-denial, and labor still more arduously to win. As a conclusion he adds: "I therefore so run, not as uncertainly; so fight I, not as one that beateth the air; but I keep under my body, and bring it into subjection, lest that by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be a cast away." By such language it is evident that the apostle acknowledged the duty of controlling the lower passions, bringing the body into subjection to the mind and soul, instead of having the soul in subjection to the body.

It would be well for those in the pursuit of health to make themselves familiar with the methods introduced by the trainers or doctors of the prize-fighters, etc.—the self-denials practiced by those who wish for the greatest amount of muscular energy and physical endurance. What applies in the case of the one will be of the same service to the other. If the pugilist may promote his health and strength by abstinence, and by reasonable muscular exercise, the Christian may do the same. If the one, a low, degraded and depraved fellow, is willing to practice self-denial simply for the approval of a vicious rabble and an insignificant purse of money, may not the Christian, with far more propriety and with far more worthy incentives, imitate these pugilists in the training, securing the approbation of the good Father, and the health and strength absolutely demanded for a life of activity and great usefulness. And yet the writer, an ardent friend of the church and the living God, has never yet seen a whole band of believers, occasionally an individual, so willing to obey the laws of the body—God's laws—as these licentious and depraved pugilists. The fact is indeed a humiliating one, and it is strange that the opposers of religion do not more frequently taunt us with our remissness of duty.

The following conversation was overheard, not long since, between a bully and his intelligent trainer, the bully having said that "just a teaspoonful of whisky could do no harm." "Well, go ahead, down with your whisky, but you can just get another trainer. You don't catch me disgracing myself. You don't know, John, that I believe in whisky as much as any man; but when we are fixing for the mill (fight) not one drop of the stuff goes down your guzzle, my boy. I will drink a double dose—one for you and one for myself—but you can't toddy your whistle till after the twenty-third."

That doctor-trainer was a man of practical science, and understood the laws of health—a safe man to follow, a public benefactor, a noble man. In the matter of training he is a teacher for far better men to follow.

But his "training" was not confined to a temporary prohibition of ardent spirits, but related to the man's whole physical nature. Such articles as the whole class of condiments, pastry, pork, tea, coffee, rich and concentrated food, tobacco, would share the fate of the ardent spirits. Just think of such an intelligent trainer "disgracing" himself, while having the charge of a pugilist, by allowing him a piece of mince-pie, a hot biscuit, a sausage, ham and eggs, a slice of toasted old cheese, pound-cake, a doughnut, a dish of fried oysters, or a plate of hot buckwheat cakes! O no; such a high-minded and intelligent gentleman knows better what his subject needs for strength and muscle. He knows too well that the "staff of life," good, honest home bread—not baker's gossamer stuff—plain, lean beef, mutton, fish, with a moderate allowance of potato, the fruits, and such food, will give him far more real strength and endurance. Nor will he let him eat lunches, late suppers, or remain in his filth. He is bathed, rubbed or brushed regularly, and is made to exercise regularly in the pure air of heaven and enjoy the sunlight, or is required to obey God's laws, to be a "muscular Christian," as a means of securing God's blessing in that respect. He is abstemious and self-denying in the matter of appetite, and has his reward, as the Christian may if he will be equally obedient. If the bully sins in eating, and is sick as the result, his trainer does not call it a mysterious dispensation of Providence. He knows better.—J. H. Hanaford.

GEOGRAPHICAL DISCOVERIES.—We learn from the English papers that her majesty's ship Basilisk, which has just returned to England after a commission of nearly four years, has surveyed about one thousand two hundred miles of coast line, added at least twelve first-class harbors, several navigable rivers, and more than one hundred islands, large and small, to the chart; and, lastly, has been able to announce the existence of a new and shorter route between Australia and China. Till these Basilisk discoveries were made, a large archipelago of islands (some as large as the Isle of Wight, and densely populated,) a rich, fertile country, intersected by navigable rivers, and inhabited by a semi-civilized Malay race, remained unknown to us. After the news of this ship's first discoveries reached England, Lieutenant Dawson, R. N. (admiralty surveyor,) was sent out to join her, and she was ordered to complete and follow them up. This has been done with perfect success, and the whole of the previously unknown shores of eastern New Guinea have been carefully surveyed, and the route above referred to opened up. The principal part of this work of discovery and surveying has been performed by the captain and officers in small open boats, detached from the ship in some instances for many weeks, and among savages who had never before seen a white face. It is stated that two lofty mountains, about eleven thousand feet high, facing each other on the northern coast of New Guinea, have been named "Mount Gladstone" and "Mount Disraeli."—Methodist.

The Tireless Brain.

Our brains are seventy years' clocks. The angel of life winds them up once for all, then closes the case and gives the key into the hands of the angel of the resurrection. Tic tac, tic tac, go the wheels of thought. Our will cannot stop them, sleep cannot still them, madness only makes them go faster. Death only can stop them by breaking into the case and seizing the ever-swinging pendulum which we call the heart, and silence at last the clicking of the terrible escapement that we have carried so long beneath our wrinkled foreheads. If we could only get at them as we lie on our pillows, and count the dead beats of thought after thought and image after image jarring through the tired organ! Will nobody block those wheels, uncouple that pinion, cut the string that holds these weights, blow up the machine with gunpowder? What a passion comes over us sometimes for silence and rest—this dreadful mechanism unwinding the endless tapestry of time, embroidered with spectral figures of life and death, could have but one brief holiday. Who can wonder that men swing themselves off from beams in hempen lassoes; that they jump off from parapets into the swift and gurgling waters beneath; that they take counsel of the grim fiend who has but to utter his peremptory monosyllable, and the restless machine is shivered as a vase dashed upon a marble floor. If anybody would really contrive some kind of a lever that we could thrust in among the works of this horrible automaton and check them or alter their rate of going, what would the world give for the discovery? Men are very apt to get at the machine by some indirect reason or other. They clap on the brakes by means of opium; they change the maddening by the use of intoxicating liquors. It is because the brain is locked up and we cannot touch the movements directly that we thrust these coarse tools in through any crevice by which they may reach the interior, alter its rates of going, and at last spoil the machine.

BISMARCK'S ORATORY.—If the sole object of political oratory were to produce immediate effect, Prince Bismarck might be pronounced the most successful orator alive. From the day when, in his famous "blood-and-iron" speech, he stood revealed to Europe as a new force with which nations had to reckon, he cannot be said to have made a speech which, for the object he had in view—that object not being always to convince his audience in the Chamber—has been entirely unsuccessful, and he has repeatedly earned a triumph of the most exciting sort. He is, in fact, by far the most effective speaker in the German Parliament, can crush an adversary with a sentence, or with a peroration can bring a majority to its feet foaming with applause. Clear and vehement in utterance, with one high oratorical faculty—that of condensing a policy into a thundering epigram translatable into languages—he shares with the younger Pitt the power of weighting his speeches with facts known only to himself, and letting out secrets, where needful, which tell like shells as they drop into an advancing column. His utter plainness, his vehement courage—so opposed to the reticence of most official speakers—his terrible frankness, whether real or assumed, and the exceptional position which makes of his words acts, all combine to give him an ascendency which sometimes seems to carry the majority out of itself, till they are ready, like some horde after a victory, to raise him on their shields and pronounce him a king of men.—Spectator.

BLUNDERS IN SPEECH.—It was a Scotch woman who said that the butcher of her town only killed half a beast at a time. It was a Dutchman who said that a pig had no marks on his ears except a short tail. It was a British magistrate who, being told by a vagabond that he was not married, responded: "That's a good thing for your wife." It was an English reporter who stated at a meeting of the Ethnological Society that there were "casts of the skull of an individual at different periods of adult life, to show the changes produced in ten years," though Dean Swift certainly mentions two skulls preserved in Ireland—one of a person when he was a boy, and the other of the same person when he grew to be a man. It was a Portuguese mayor who enumerated, among the marks by which the body of a drowned man might be identified when found, "a marked impediment in his speech." It was a Frenchman—the famous Carlino—who, contentedly laying his head upon a large stone jar for a pillow, replied to one who inquired if it was not rather hard: "Not at all, for I have stuffed it with hay." It was an American lecturer who solemnly said one evening: "Parents, you may have children; or, if not, your daughters may have."

THERE has been found in the Bodleian library at Oxford, England, the earliest copy of the earliest text of the canons of the church, ending with the fourth General Council in 450. It may be recommended, says the Academy, to the notice of Mr. Gladstone in his present controversy with the Vatican, since it illustrates that contempt for the petty considerations of morality for which the papacy has so often been famous. Pope Zosimus claimed pontifical jurisdiction over the African church, and rested his claim on a Nicene canon which could never be discovered. After his death a Sardican canon was substituted for the imaginary Nicene one, and as the fictitious canon increased the original number of the canons of the Sardican Council, some pages have been torn from the Bodleian manuscript, to make the order of the Sardican canons given in it agree with that now received by the Roman Church. The manuscript belonged to Justellus, the French Protestant who became the librarian of William the Third.

Scientific.

THE commission of engineers appointed by the government to examine the levee system of the Mississippi have recently submitted a report. They think it will require a great deal of time, and at least $46,000,000 to build a permanent system of levees, and reclaim the lands subject to overflowing. They recommend an immediate appropriation of $2,000,000 for closing breaks and crevasses already existing in Louisiana and Arkansas.

SOME philosophy may be learned from so simple a thing as corn-popping. The same power that drives the locomotive bursts the kernel. The minute quantity of water in the grain is made into steam, which explodes the grains as an engine boiler sometimes explodes. When the corn is too damp it does not pop, because the kernel is tough, the steam makes a small vent for itself and escapes with a hiss. Neither does it pop well when too dry, because there is too little water to make the necessary amount of steam.

MR. S. J. MIXTER notices a curious effect of a gas flame on the current of a Holtz machine. The jet consisted of a glass tube drawn out to a point, and the flame had a length of about an inch and a diameter of only an eighth of an inch. Inserting this between the two terminals of the machine, the length of spark obtainable was at once increased from less than ten inches to over twelve, the full distance to which the balls could be separated. The same increase was not obtained by simply inserting a conductor between the two terminals, a ball an inch in diameter only lengthening the spark about an inch.

THE London Engineer says: From careful experiment Dr. Richardson concludes that since the red blood globules of the pig or red deer, cat, horse, sheep and goat "are all so much smaller than are the ordinary minimum size of the human red disk, as computed in my investigations, we are now able, by aid of high powers of the microscope, and under favorable circumstances, positively to distinguish stains produced by human blood of any one of the animals just enumerated; and this even after a lapse of five years, at least, from the date of their primary production." This will be important in criminal trials.

M. MELSENS has proposed a simple method of liquefying condensable gases by making use of the powerful surface action of charcoal. With chlorine, for example, he saturates the charcoal with its own weight of the gas, places it in one limb of a V-shaped tube, seals both ends thereof, applies boiling water to the limb containing the charcoal, and dips the other limb in a freezing mixture. The chlorine, volatilized by the heat, condenses, by the pressure generated in the confined space, into a liquid in the cooled limb. In this way ammonia, sulphurous oxide, hydrogen sulphide, hydrogen bromide, ethyl chloride and cyanogen have been liquefied.

THE process of skin-grafting promises to receive a fresh impetus from the labors of M. Anger, a French surgeon. The main feature of his discoveries is that pieces of skin taken from amputated limbs may be used to obtain cicatrization on the bodies of other subjects. Hitherto the desired portions of skin were taken from one part of a patient's body and applied to another part. It is stated that in one case the surgeon cut pieces of skin from the surface of an amputated finger and applied them to the ulcerated leg of another person. In three days the bandages were removed, and the grafted parts were found intimately united to the surface and evidently vascularized. It seems essential to the success of the process that the graft be made immediately after amputation. The name given to this operation is "heteroplasty."

FOURTEEN THOUSAND MILES OF ICE.—The Hudson river ice crop for 1875 has now been harvested, and is one of the largest and finest ever gathered. The blocks average fourteen inches in thickness, and the total quantity secured is about two millions of tons, or seventy millions of cubic feet. If this mass of ice were arranged in a single line or beam, twelve inches square, it would have a total length of about fourteen thousand miles, and would reach more than half way around the world. To transport the entire quantity above named simultaneously in ice carts, each carrying two tons, drawn by two horses, driven by one man, would require an army of a million men, two millions of horses and a million of vehicles. This enormous supply of ice will be chiefly consumed in the city of New York. It is brought down the Hudson river from the great ice-houses, which are located at the water's edge, in large barges, towed by steam. It is delivered directly from the barges into the ice carts, and in them conveyed to the doors of private dwellings. For a quarter to half a ton a month is a common supply for a small family. The price charged is from $15 to $30 a ton for families, according to the scarcity or abundance of the supply. Large consumers, such as market men and hotel and restaurant keepers, get the article at a much less price.—Scientific American.

TRANSFORMATION OF A CONSTELLATION.—The notions hitherto entertained as to the stars and the heavens are destined to undergo a complete revolution. There are no fixed stars. Each one of those distant suns, flaming in infinitude, is sweeping along in a stupendous movement which the imagination can hardly conceive. Notwithstanding the countless millions of miles of space between them and us, making them appear to us only as luminous points, whereas they are as great as our own sun, and thousands and millions of times greater than the earth, still, by means of the telescope and computation, astronomers have been able to come at them, and to demonstrate that they are all moving in every possible direction. The heavens are no longer motionless, nor can the constellation any longer be regarded as the symbol of the unchangeable. Take, for instance, Ursa Major, or the Great Bear, the first of the constellations to be observed and named. Who is there that has not taken that figure as the enduring symbol of the pre-established harmony, the unalterable duration of the firmament? Well, that ancient constellation will be destroyed. Each one of the stars which constitute it is endowed with a movement of its own. The result is that, in course of time, the form of Ursa Major will be changed. It now resembles in outline a wagon, and hence its popular title everywhere of car or wain, while the learned have given it the name of the Bear, that being the only animal known to the ancients as living in the polar regions. As every one knows, the four stars arranged in the form of a quadrilateral are supposed to represent the four wheels, and the three stars in the front of the figure three horses. But the proper movement of the separate stars will alter this arrangement; it will bring the foremost horse to a point back of where he now is, while the other two will move onward. As for the two hinder wheels, they will proceed in contrary directions. When we know the annual value of the displacement of each of these seven stars, we can calculate their future relative positions. This I have done, and I here lay before the reader the curious result of my calculations.—Popular Science Monthly.

REFLECTED SUNLIGHT THEORY OF THE AURORA BOREALIS.—Certain speculations of a German observer—Dr. Wolfert—have been put forth, taking an entirely new departure from the generally accepted view among scientists, and claiming that the beautiful and seemingly erratic phenomena of the Northern Light are due not to electricity, but to reflected sunlight. Dr. Wolfert says: "The earth being conceived as a large mirror, many of the obliquel's incident rays will be reflected to a part of the celestial vault which is visible to the night side of the earth. The zodiacal light, an incompleto luminous ellipse, appearing in tropical skies before sunrise and after sunset, is probably thus formed—an irregular reflection of sunlight from water. Similarly, in case of the Northern Light, the vast fields of ice in polar regions may be regarded as an imperfect mirror irregularly reflecting the incident light." Dr. Wolfert elaborates his theory at some length, and combats or endeavors to combat objections to it, but the extract given above contains the gist of the whole. It seems to us completely untenable, and we do not believe that it will in the least shake the well-established connection between these phenomena and electricity and terrestrial magnetism, aside from which two obvious objections would seem conclusive against the theory of reflected solar light. The first is the irregularity of the occurrence of the Aurora, which precludes the hypothesis of a cause regular in its action. Neither the great reflecting mirror—that is, the ice-fields—changes materially from day to day, or even from month to month, nor does the sun's light perceptibly vary. How is it, then, that auroras occur at exceedingly irregular intervals, and that a display of exceptional brilliancy is occasionally simultaneously observed, over a whole hemisphere, or nearly so? The second objection is the peculiar history character of the display which so frequently inspires the admiration of the beholder, and is entirely inconsistent with the supposition of a reflector casting upon the sky its light borrowed from a constant and unvarying source. It is impossible thus reasonably to explain the flickering, rapidly shifting forms and varying colors of the Aurora Borealis. Nothing in any way analogous has ever been elsewhere observed in reflected light. Besides, the points of the heavens at which the auroral forms sometimes show and group themselves are impossible to any theory of reflected sunlight.—American Artisan.

IN THE LAST lecture of his course of twelve before the Museum of Comparative Zoology, in Boston, Prof. Agassiz protested against the Darwinian theory. Of the four grand divisions—the radiates, the articulates, the mollusks and the vertebrates—he holds that, though a change may be possible in any one of these four groups, yet a change from one to the other is impossible; that embryonic likeness between the different groups is no proof that one has been developed out of another. "We see," he says, "that fishes are lowest, that reptiles are higher, that birds have a superior organization to both, and that mammals, with man at their head, are highest. The phases of development which a quadruped undergoes, in his embryonic growth, recall this gradation. He has a fish-like, a reptile-like stage before he shows unmistakable mammal-like features. We do not on this account suppose that a quadruped grows out of a fish in our times, for this simple reason: that we live among quadrupeds and fishes, and we know that no such things take place. But resemblances of the same kind, separated by geological ages, allow play for the imagination, and for inference unchecked by observation. * * * There is no inevitable repetition, no mechanical evolution in the geological succession of organic life. It has the correspondence of connected plan; it has just that kind of resemblance in the parts, so much and no more, as always characterizes intellectual work proceeding from the same source; it has that freedom of manifestation, that independence which characterizes the work of mind as compared with the work of law; * * * it is a resemblance of the same kind as that which we express by the idea of unity, harmony, coherence; it is the utterance of the same truth by the same mind at different times; the utterance of the same thought in different languages; it is an intellectual unity, not a material connection. * * * I believe that all these correspondences between the different aspects of animal life are the manifestations of mind acting consciously with intention toward one object from beginning to end. This view is in accordance with the working of our minds; it is an instinctive recognition of a mental power with which our own is akin, manifesting itself in nature. For this reason, more than any other, perhaps, do I hold that this world of ours is not the result of the action of unconscious organic forces, but the work of an intelligent, conscious power."

Beginning Wedded Life.

Two young, loving hearts, just joined in one for life, begin an epoch in their history most interesting, and most significant for good or evil to themselves in the present and future life. Such should regard it well, and not be unwilling to avail themselves of all the helps and suggestions which may serve their good. It is to this end we here pen our thoughts. It is well for them to know clearly and realize the fact fully that marriage is a divine institution. In this rests its solemn obligation, its binding force, its moral and spiritual character. It is far more than a contract between the parties. This is only one feature of it, the formal and outward, which is cognizant to law, and which is all of it that secular authority can give or condition by statutory enactment. This being true, it must readily be seen what religion or Christianity has to do with and what is its bearing upon the marriage relation. It is that alone which properly endows two loving hearts to be joined in one, and gives free room for the marriage relation to confer upon them all the happiness it is designed to afford. Presuming, however, that those beginning wedded life recognize the Christian character of the relation they have assumed, and that through grace they have attained the proper preparation for its enjoyments and duties, we would kindly offer the suggestions we have to make.

In their Christian character they possess the most important requisite to this new epoch in their history. Just now they should estimate this requisite of still greater value, recognize more clearly its necessity, appreciate more fully the means through which it is nurtured, and strive more earnestly to strengthen and quicken it. The reverse of this is often seen. Young persons beginning married life often find sufficiency of delight in each other's society, and sufficiency of occupation in doing for themselves, to the temporary neglect of those duties belonging to them as Christian persons in their Christian relations. Very frequent it is, but with strange logic and injurious results, that marriage is made the occasion to vacate positions of Christian activity and service. Their retirement from Sunday school work, from their active part in the social relation of the church, and the frequent neglect of prayer meeting and public worship, is often a detriment not easily measured, and a danger which cannot be too carefully guarded against. What may be thought only a slight or indifferent variation too often ends in a permanent habit of neglect, or an entire relapse of feeling and views. It is a wrong step, taken at the worst time, just when a different course would be of the most service and permanent value.

The very course pursued may be expected to be complemented by a lack of religious interest and feeling in their relations with each other, just at the time when these should be most free, and stimulated by the greatest possible activity in Christian duty and work. Nothing should be wanting or left undone in this opportune season to call out in the largest, freest measure the religious life of one toward the other. Each should learn and know frankly the Christian soul-life of the other, and find in it a virtue and value never found before.

As they continue and stand together firmly in Christian activity and work, so should they now together bow in prayer and continue steadfast in its spirit. Too often the reverse of this is the fact. Even when before they were accustomed to come daily around the altar of family prayer, or engage in private devotions, they now feel a timidity to take in hand and perform this duty. It is neglected in the start, it grows into a habit, and that essential part of a Christian family, the altar of prayer, is never erected, or, if erected, only when the cheerful spring-time of wedded life is past, and the season of prayer's sweetest influence is gone forever—a loss which can never be repaired. The young husband and wife in the happy flow of soul to soul, surrounded with the pleasing tokens of the marriage hour, in the freshly fitted home, where every piece of furniture and every spot seems redolent with love, should not omit from these happy associations the exercise of daily thanksgiving and heartfelt prayer.

The Bible, the family Bible, should be put the first of books and first in its place. Ever before the eye and ever in the hand to guard, guide and bless the new home and house as a light to cheer in prosperity, and prepare for hours of disappointment, affliction and sorrow. For these, too, will come. Solid reading and Christian literature are needed to plant the home, which is more than the house which shelters, on a solid and permanent foundation. The religious family paper, like a message from all the church, should come as a welcome visitor, bearing tidings from the great brotherhood of Christians, awakening a common interest and sympathy in the Christian cause. Such makes home a pleasant garden of the Lord, where beautiful flowers perennially bloom. Such homes are a blessing to the world. Christian World.

AN IGNORANT MAN in England, who for some reason was elected to make a presentation to the parish clergyman on behalf of the parishioners, made a little speech in which he thought to enforce his flattering remarks by a Scripture quotation. He spoke warmly of all the parson's merits, his diligence and his eloquence, and finally rose to a climax: "In fact, sir, to use the words of the Apostle Paul, you are just like sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal!"

The Mother-in-Law.

A GERMAN LEGEND—(FREE TRANSLATION)

A Teuton youth was born to fame,
And Meister Michel was his name,
Of valiant deeds the hero;
And when he drew his sword in fight
His foeman fell by Fahrenheit,
From bloodshed down brzero.

At length his wildest oats were sown;
Himself to roan's estate had grown
With heavy cares beladen;
He sought to ease the woes of life
By taking him a pious wife—
Ecclesia, the maiden.

Now Mistress Roma saw with pride
Of such a lord her daughter bride,
Herself in law his mother.
Her blessing on them both she laid;
"I'll visit you," she blandly said,
"When need be and no bother."

Upon their union turned the key
That locked them in felicity
For weeks, like moments fleeting.
Ecclesia was so well content,
She quite forgot the visit meant
By her mamma's last greeting.

Surprised one day, the lovers saw
Within their house the mother-in-law,
Their guest quite self-invited;
Advising what she would or wouldn't,
And what they could not what they couldn't,
And everything she blighted.

Good Meister Michel hated strife,
And loved Ecclesia, his wife—
Did everything to soothe her;
But when he failed to please his spouse,
While Mother Roma roamed the house,
He called on Doctor Luther.

Great Martin answered somewhat gruff:
"My son, Ecclesia's well enough.
Dost well that well doest treat her;
'Tis Roma is the naughty hack
That rides you down; so send her back
A relic to (Saint) Peter."

Yes! "send the vixen home" sounds well,
But only served to make her yell:
"Anathema on breeches!
You'll feel my fangs; I'll never go;
I'll make your blood of varlets flow.
By Jesuitic leeches!"

Soon Michel and Ecclesia, too,
Each other fought till black and blue,
While Roma viewed their battles;
When overcome by strife and din,
The Jesuits called the neighbor in
To seize their goods and chattels.

"Potz, Donnerwetter!" Michel said;
"I'll knock this rumpus on the head
And bring these folks to reason."
He kicked the neighbors back to France,
Across the Alps made Roma dance
And Ultramontane treason.

Then order reigned at Michel's house;
Ecclesia, peaceful as a mouse,
Was sorry for her blunder;
She decked herself with robe and cap,
And with her Michel took a nap,
Though Roma threatened thunder.

The Mission of Medicine.

The following is the address to the graduating class of the Medical Department of the Vanderbilt University, delivered at Nashville, February 26, by Prof. Thomas O. Summers, Jr., M. D.:

GENTLEMEN OF THE GRADUATING CLASS: Strange feelings press in upon me as I address you on this occasion. Only a few short years ago I sat where you are now assembled, to receive the benediction of the same august body whom I have the honor and the privilege to represent before you to-night. And before the echoes of its melting music have died out along the corridors of my mind, I would fain reflect them upon you, fresh from the walls of memory, that they may quicken the activities of your being and stir the energies of your life.

As you stand at this moment on the brink of that river on whose farther shore are gathered the hopes and promises of your future lives, I call upon you to pause; not like the mighty Roman at the Rubicon, shivering at his ambitious plunge, but rather like the Hebrew warrior, to gather from the path already trodden some enduring memorials of blessing, and plant them beneath the waters now rolling backward to invite your passage.

The calling upon which you are about to enter needs no eulogium from me. Born of the instincts, and nourished by the necessities of humanity, it has ever commanded the respect and challenged the admiration of the world. In all ages and among all nations the mission of the healer has dignified his person and elevated his character.

The besotted Bushman, with his listless Beotian stare, climbing and crawling and chattering with his anthropoid brethren of the forest, into whose embryonic brain no scintillation of Deity has ever flashed, establishes his humanity by the superstitious reverence with which he regards the besmeared and bedizened medicine-man of his tribe, who stands, however impotently as to us it may seem, between him and the common enemy of man.

Among the enlightened Greeks and Romans, and the Egyptians, the true fathers of science, the person of the healer was held at once both sacred and supernatural. Regarded in the earlier times of the Jewish theocracy as a function of the priesthood, and at a later day assuming, through its rapid advancement, a more distinctively professional character, the vocation of medicine among the Hebrews was heralded with honor and garlanded with glory.

Hear the outburst of the wise Siraches: "Honor a physician with the honor due unto him for the uses which ye may have of him; for the Lord hath created him. For of the Most High cometh healing, and he shall receive honor of the king. The skill of the physician shall lift up his head; and in the sight of great men he shall be in admiration."

The enemy of no man, but the friend of all, he moves unharmed on the war path of the savage, and crosses, unchallenged, the guard-lines of contending hosts. On the great battle-ground of humanity, where the forces of disease are marshaled, and the shadowy pinions of Death are swooping, the world has ever been dazzled by the heaven-wide flash of your armor, and the glitter of your rainbow crests.

The universality of the healer's mission, no less than its inherent dignity, elevates it above the atmosphere of perfunctory professionality, into the higher sphere of devoted consecration. Medicine is not a profession, but a vocation. If there be one among you prompted by any other motive than that of ameliorating the condition of his fellow-man, by smoothing, at least, his pathway to the tomb, and blotting out, as best he may, somewhat of the serpent's trail in Eden's bowers, let me beseech him to take not upon himself the solemn responsibilities of this hour, and bring condemnation upon our Israel, by offering strange fire upon her altars.

Not only, gentlemen, are you to rest under a sense of the dignity and excellence of this mission upon which you are about to enter, but you are to feel also your high commission to fulfill its purposes and advance its interests. Being thus actuated, it becomes you to separate yourselves wholly to this work. "Henceforth ye are not your own." You have invested your characters, your energies, your talents and your lives in the great mission which is before you, and with it you are to sink or swim, survive or perish. Much there will be to chill your enthusiasm and dampen your ardor. You enter upon your career under the cloud of an ostracism more powerful in its influence and more rigid in its exactions than the shell-recorded banishments of ancient Rome. Like the immortal Pitt, you stand charged with the atrocious crime of being young men, and the cold shadow of its enormity will wither many a fresh and brilliant hope, and the chilling breath of frosty-haired Experience will usher in early upon you the winter of your discontent. O! I can see him now—the wise-looking old professional owl—going about from house to house, "damning" you continually "with the faint praise" of "A promising young man?"

Happily for you, however, the recent advances of positive science are rapidly reducing all claims to professional recognition and preferment to the simple test of actual attainment. "What can you do?"—not "what have you done?"—will be the touchstone of the future, for, thanks to the scientific investigators of our own day, the world is fast learning the deep significance of that pregnant truth, thundered out somewhat conceitedly, it must be admitted, by the hero of the "Patrician's Daughter:"

"It may be by the calendar of years
You are the elder man; but 'tis the sun
Of knowledge on the mind's dial, shining bright,
And chronicling deeds and thoughts, that makes true time."

Experience is like the stern-light of a vessel, throwing its brilliance over the track of the traveled past, but sending not one single ray into the Cimmerian darkness beyond; and when the intellectual balance of the world is struck, professional worth and moral character will be submitted to one and the same test:

"Not what and how many the seas you have passed,
But what is the state of your soul at the last."

The field you are to enter is as broad as the universe, and limited only by the confines of Time. No iron-clad dogma holds you chained and chafing in its "pent-up Utica." Your mission is to heal, and your commission bears the imprimatur of him to whom the highest tribute of humanity has been paid—that he went about doing good. In the light of such a character, how contemptible and degraded does that man appear who, caparisoned in the gaudy trappings of some creed or pathy, rides into power over the ignorance or fanaticism of the deluded multitude! Seduced by no glittering examples of spurious success, you are to press on in your heaven-ordained labor of love, crystallizing every thought about this the governing purpose of your life—the fulfillment of your glorious mission.

Who can estimate the potential energy of a high commission? "There is one God, and Mohammed is his prophet"—the first a truth, sublime in its annunciation and powerful in its wide relation; but it is the "Mohammed is his prophet" that floats upon the solemn stillness of the evening air from every sun-bathed Eastern minaret, and chains the Orient in the bondage of fanaticism and superstition. 'Twas this that kindled the genius of the Child of Destiny, and curdled the blood currents of civilization with the electric thunders of his majestic tread. Alexander and Cæsar, Charlemagne and Napoleon, were charged with glory, and burst big with self-hood and ambition. Their empires, founded on force and supported by fear, are now dead, or dying of age or decay. No less than four hundred and twenty species of plants flourish to-day on the ruins of the Coliseum, and of France there seems to be naught left but anarchy and convulsion. But there is a mission, the vitality of which flickers not before the changing winds of human fortunes, and rests not upon the feeble supports of mortal glory. That mission is love, and across the chasm of two thousand years we can see the sympathetic tear-drop sparkling in the radiant countenance of the great Physician, and hear his mighty heart throbbing in unison with the pulses of human woe.

Other heroes may dazzle you with their achievements, and from the proud heights of glory light up for you the signal-fires of ambition, but remember that the banner which floats above you bears ever and only the name of him, the music of whose voice so often blended with the ripples of Galilee, and over whose aching brow fell darkling the somber shadows of Olivet.

Gentlemen, the age of chivalry is not over. The rustling of those fading banners which tell of the knights of former times may yet be heard in this world of ours. Am I wrong in believing that I hear it along your lines to-night? It may not be yours to prance in the tilt-yard amidst the sheen of bright lances, and before maidens' eyes; but a lordlier, a holier chivalry awaits you, fenced not in by the blood of Plantagenet or Howard, but open to every valiant hero. Go, then, where this glory waits you. Enter the lazarettoes of earth, where the lepers herd, and pour upon them the healing balm. Go, in the strength of your mighty mission, to the dens of infamy and the haunts of crime, and float your gospel message upon the heavy and feculent air. Go wherever there is pain to palliate, or grief to assuage, or wounds to heal. Go wherever faith can see, or hope can breathe, or love can work, or courage can venture—go and win the spurs of your knighthood there.

Upon an ancient Grecian coin there was stamped an altar and a plow; between them stood a bullock, and beneath him the inscription: "Ready for either"—for life or death, for service or sacrifice. Be it ever thus with each one of you, and, though without are fightings and within are fears, be you as the idol of Germany:

"Like a star,
Unhasting, unresting,"
"Each one fulfilling his God-given best."

Among the bells of the Campanile, at Florence, is one called the Misericordia. It is tolled when the services of the society whose name it bears are needed, and at the summons of that bell, whether it strike upon the stillness of midnight, or solemnly boom through the banquet hall, each member of the brotherhood is bound, forsaking all other engagements, to take his turn as a helper in the work of mercy. And the historian tells us that through all changes of dynasty, amid the rise and fall of nobles, while the sky has been dark with troubles, and the streets dishonored with blood, while the tempest has uprooted governments which seemed so stable, and the fortunes of the city have been alternately on the crest and in the trough of the waves, this institution has survived like a pharos in a stormy sea, flinging its white light across the waters, though the waves howled about it in fury, and the broad shoulders of the hurricane pressed heavily against its solid form. O! it is beautiful to think that wherever Christianity has gone, even in partial or corrupt manifestation, this human charity, a stranger from some other world, has found for itself a mission and a home. Who shall despair of a world, however fallen, when one touch of "sorrow can make all men kin"—while Raphael—the "Medicine of God"—the sociable spirit "who made Tobias whole"—is still moving among us with his messages of healing and of love? Fly on, bright angel, through the suffering world:

"Swift we pursue thee, flaming guide,
On pinions of our own!"

Go forth, then, with this your high commission, and see that you blot not the fair escutcheon of your calling. God forbid that the "Perdidi diem" of the regretful Roman should deepen into a "Perdidi vitam" for you; but when your course on earth is ended, let your epitaph be like hers of whom Jean Ingelow has so touchingly written:

"So said, he raised, according to his vow,
On the green grass, where oft his townsfolk met
Under the shadow of a leafy bough
That leaned toward a singing rivulet,
A pure white stone whereon, like crown on brow,
The image of the vanished star was set;
And this was graven on the pure white stone
In golden letters—While she loved she shone."

Thoughts for the Month for Planters.

To make large crops of corn on uplands early planting is essential for a three-fold reason: 1. Because the crop has a longer period for developing. 2. Because maturity is secured before the terrible heat and drouths of July. 3. Because retardation of growth above ground in early spring is attended with unusual growth below ground. The first two points are self-evident; a few words on the third: Corn belongs to the same family as the small grains, and its habits, in some respects, are very similar to theirs. Universally in our climate the small grains yield better crops when sown in fall or early winter than when sown in the spring. During winter their growth above ground may be very trifling—they may be closely grazed—and still the above statement holds good. The explanation is easy. It is simply this: That while the cold or the pasturing holds in check the leaves and stems above ground, the roots are constantly growing and multiplying, ramifying through the soil and seeking appropriate food for the development of the plant. In other words, root growth preponderates over stem and leaf growth, which is always a healthier condition than the reverse. It is well known to every nurseryman that in the case of deciduous plants, as our ordinary fruit-trees, root growth continues more or less through the winter, while there are none of the parts above ground. Trees taken up in the fall and heeled in will sometimes, in a few weeks, show quite a development of new roots.

As compared with late-planted corn, early-planted has a smaller stock but larger ear. Upon those planting for large yields we especially urge, therefore, the importance of early planting. Let it not be forgotten that the earlier the planting the shallower should the seed be buried.

The proper mode of applying manure to corn may in part be decided by considering the arrangement of its roots. In the early stages of growth maize emits long, slender roots, which stretch out on all sides and ramify in every direction. As the period of fruiting approaches it develops spur or brace roots. Unlike the first set, these are stout, and push downward instead of spreading laterally; they demean themselves almost like so many tap roots, penetrating to considerable depths and emitting very numerous but rather short secondary roots. No one who has ever examined these spur or brace roots can doubt that the bracing of the stock is a secondary and not their primary function. Their immense quantity of small fibrous roots must be intended for active absorption of material near the base of the stalk, at a time, too, when the plant needs food more abundantly. Near the stalk then, and on all sides of it, we conclude, is the place to put manure, and general practice coincides with the deduction. Placed there it is daily moistened by the dew which, condensed by the leaves, and running down them to the stem and finally to the ground, soaks in at the base of the stalk. The same concentration of moisture takes place also at every light shower of rain.

BEDDING COTTON LAND.

Where no manure is applied, or ordinary commercial fertilizers are used, bedding of cotton land may be advantageously continued this month. Bed the lighter lands first, and leave the stiff for the last, that they may escape, if possible, compacting rains. Where washing can be guarded against high beds are decidedly the best, as they admit of being cut down just in advance of planting-time, leaving a fresh, smooth surface to receive the seed. An ordinary triangular harrow, with the teeth set, some short and some long, so as to conform to the general outline of the bed, will do this rapidly and well. The importance of a good stand cannot be overestimated, and hardly any trouble or labor which tends to secure it can be considered unreasonable or expensive. If the tops of ones cotton beds are cloddy, or encumbered with rocks or turfs of grass, the opening plow cannot make a furrow of uniform depth, and some of the seed will inevitably be covered too shallow or too deep. This we try to obviate by shaving down the bed with the harrow, as above.

PUTTING IN COMMERCIAL FERTILIZERS.

In some respects this work is best done with cotton planters; these can be gauged to distribute it with perfect uniformity, and from discharging the fertilizer near the ground avoid its being blown off by the wind. The chief objection to their work is the concentration of the manure in a very narrow line at the bottom of the drill. A coulter following the planter would mix the fertilizers with the soil, and this would be a decided improvement. Especial care should be taken to put the manure deep enough to feed the cotton plant and not the grass; it should be at least three inches below the surface.

QUANTITY PER ACRE.

This is regulated by richness and depth of soil, and the presence or absence of vegetable matter—the richer, deeper and more abounding is the soil in vegetable matter the larger the quantity that may be safely and profitably used. On ordinary medium lands one hundred and fifty to two hundred and fifty pounds of fertilizers pay best.

THE KIND OF FERTILIZER

it is best to apply depends also on the character of land. The richer the soil and the more humus it contains the less ammonia and the more phosphoric acid it should receive. New ground and old pine-fields just cleared, for instance, need no ammonia, but will be benefited by liberal supplies of superphosphate. Poor old lands need pretty liberal applications of ammonia to secure sufficient weed.

TOP-DRESSING SMALL GRAIN.

Very little of this is done in the South, and yet perhaps no outlay for fertilizers pays better. March is the proper time for dressing wheat, etc. Peruvian or guanape guano is admirable; but for the liability of loss from gaseous elements in the air, if a moderate rain does not fall immediately after it is scattered it is not carried into the soil. Nitrate of soda is, everything considered, the best article for top-dressing grains. It does not waste from exposure to sun and wind; it is very soluble, and is quickly carried into the ground by rain; its action upon plants is prompt and decided. Fifty to seventy-five pounds per acre will improve a crop wonderfully. It is furnished in most markets, being one of the substances employed in the fertilizers manufactured from "chemicals." The cost should be about five to five and a half cents a pound; in New York at wholesale it is worth three cents a pound in gold.

CLOVER AND GRASS.

These may still be sown on small grain with success, if the spring does not prove too dry. There is always risk of late-sown clover and grass dying out when the heat of summer comes. Clover sown on grain a year ago is likely to have a crop of rag-weed mixed with it. When this is the case run a roller or brush over the land some frosty morning and mash them down; they will then be less in the way at mowing-time.—Top-dress clover now with plaster—one hundred pounds per acre—and if the land is poor help it with one hundred pounds superphosphate per acre, in addition to the plaster. Keep off all stock if a crop of hay is to be cut.

Top-dress lands with some nitrogenous manure—Peruvian guano or nitrate soda—the latter to be preferred. Fifty to one hundred pounds per acre will suffice.—Southern Cultivator.

THE London Athenæum says: "It is well known that Napoleon the First was never educated as a lawyer, nor a member of any legislative assembly, and that the short speeches about law which he uttered before the Conseil d'Etat, during the consulate, were prepared for him by Cambaceres, who, by the way, had failed in the task intrusted to him by the Constituent Assembly of codifying the French civil law. The real authors of the Code Civil were Tronchet, Bigot de Preameau and Portalis; but the time of its publication coinciding with the assumption of the imperial crown by the first consul, the collection was called Code Napoleon. During the thirty-three years of the restoration and the July government the code resumed its original and more natural title of Code Civil, but was again baptized Code Napoleon under the second empire. Now it is officially the Code Civil, although most of its recent editors and commentators persist in retaining the spurious title, in opposition to the law itself, which was passed in March, 1803. Thus, in many editions published in 1872–3, it is declared that no law is valid unless proclaimed by the Emperor; that no marriages may take place between uncle and niece, brother-in-law and sister-in-law, without the permission of the Emperor. The public prosecutor is called 'Procureur Imperial,' while no judge or barrister would dare now to call him otherwise than 'Procureur de la Republique.' The reason for such discrepancies lies much less in a settled intention to deny past events, or to foster desperate hopes, than in this material fact: all the editions of the Code Civil are generally stereotyped, and the publishers do not choose to incur the expense of setting it up again in types."

The California Wood-Rat.

While on the northern coast I noticed a fact in natural history, to me quite curious, regarding the habits of the so-called California wood-rat. I am not sufficiently versed in such matters to give you the name of this interesting creature. It is a little larger than an ordinary Norway rat, dark-brown in color, with large, lustrous eyes, and a tail covered with thin hairs. I should call it intermediate between the squirrel and rat. This creature builds its nest in the woods—sometimes on the ground, more frequently in the lower branches of trees. They accumulate a surprising quantity of dried twigs, which they interlace to form a dome-shaped structure, often ten or twelve feet high and six or eight feet in diameter.

Openings in the mass lead to the center, where is found the nest, consisting of the finely-divided inner bark of trees, dried grass, etc. But it is to the peculiar thievish propensity of this little creature that I wish to call attention.

To make my story intelligible, I would first state that I am partial owner of some property on the Oregon coast, on which a saw mill had been placed, but which, owing to various causes, has never been in operation. On this property was a dwelling-house for the hands, in which, on work being discontinued, was stored a quantity of stuff—tools, packing for the engine, six or seven kegs of large spikes; in the closets, knives, forks, spoons, etc. A large cooking stove was left in one of the rooms.

This house was left uninhabited for two years, and, being at some distance from the little settlement, it was frequently broken into by tramps, who sought a shelter for the night. When I entered this house I was astonished to see an immense rat's nest on an empty stove. On examining this nest, which was about five feet in height and occupied the whole top of the stove (a large range,) I found the outside to be composed entirely of spikes, all laid with symmetry, so as to present the points of the nails outward. In the center of this mass was the nest, composed of finely-divided fibers of the hemp packing. Interlaced with the spikes we found the following: about three dozen knives, forks and spoons; all the butcher knives, three in number; a large carving knife, fork and steel; several large plugs of tobacco; the outside casing of a silver watch was disposed of in one part of the pile, the glass of the same watch in another, and the works in still another; an old purse, containing some silver, matches and tobacco; nearly all the small tools from the tool closets, among them several large augers. Altogether it was a very curious mixture of different articles, all of which must have been transported some distance, as they were originally stored in different parts of the house.

The ingenuity and skill displayed in the construction of this nest, and the curious taste for articles of iron, many of them heavy, for component parts, struck me with surprise. The articles of value were, I think, stolen from the men who had broken into the house for temporary lodging. I have preserved a sketch of this ironclad nest, which I think unique in natural history.

Many curious facts have since been related me concerning the habits of this little creature. A miner told me the following: He once, during the mining excitement in Siskiyou county, became, in California parlance, "dead borke," and applied for and obtained employment in a mining camp, where the owners, hands and all slept in the same cabin. Shortly after his arrival small articles commenced to disappear. If a whole plug of tobacco were left on the table it would be gone in the morning. Finally a bag, containing one hundred or more dollars in gold dust, was taken from a small table at the head of a "bunk," in which one of the proprietors of the claim slept. Suspicion fell on the newcomer, and he would perhaps have fared hardly, for with those rough miners punishment is short and sharp; but, just in time, a large rat's nest was discovered in the garret of the cabin, and in it was found the missing money, as well as the tobacco and other articles supposed to have been stolen.—A. W. Chase, in the American Journal of Science.

INCONGRUITIES OF HYMNS.—In the course of a recent lecture on "Congregational Psalmody," the Rev. Dr. Allan noticed some of the incongruities that used to occur by the awkward divisions in repetition lines. For instance: "Love thee better than before" was divided "love thee bet-;" "my poor polluted heart" became "my poor pol-;" "we'll catch the fleeting hour" was sung "we'll catch the flee-;" "and more exact our joys" was sung "and more ex-;" "and take thy pilgrim home" became "and take thy pil-;" "and in the pious ice delights" was sung "and in the pi- and in the pl-;" and "send down salvation from on high" became "send down sal-." A soprano in one case sang: "Oh" for a man, and the chorus responded, "Oh, for a mansion in the skies." In one case the soprano modestly sang: "Teach me to kiss;" the alto took up the strain, "teach me to kiss," while the bass rendered it quite prosaic by singing, "teach me to kiss the rod."

Epitaph on a Watchmaker.

(Taken from a stone in the old church-yard of Lidford, in Devon, England.)

Here lies, in a horizontal position,
The outside case of George Rougleigh, watchmaker,
Whose abilities in that line were an honor
To his profession.
Integrity was the mainspring,
And prudence the regulator,
Of all the actions of his life.
Humane, generous and liberal,
His hand never stopped
Till he had relieved distress;
So nicely were all his actions regulated
That he never went wrong,
Except when set agoing
By people
Who did not know his key;
Even then he was easily set right again.
He had the art of disposing his time so well
That his hours glided away
In one continual round
Of pleasure and delight,
Till an unlucky minute put a period to
His existence.
He departed this life November 14, 1802,
Aged 57;
Wound up
In hopes of being taken in hand
By his Maker,
And of being thoroughly cleaned and repaired
And set agoing
In the world to come.

The Library System.

MR. EDITOR: In your October number we have read the explanation of "Ray's Patent Check System Library Register;" and, as you propose to "give a series of articles on the library," we have thought it might not be altogether out of the way to present you a view of our unpatented system, under which our school library has been worked, for several years past, quite successfully.

Each book of the library is numbered, and has a separate stall or apartment, which bears the same number as the book.

In front of the library extends a narrow table, divided into small apartments, each bearing the name of one of the classes of the school, for deposit of the books, as returned by each several class.

The library is furnished with a library card and library ticket. These are of card paper, say three by five inches in size, with their captions each respectively printed across the upper face; under which, on both card and ticket, is room for the name, number, residence and class of the scholar; and below, the card has blank for the numbers of the books desired, while upon the ticket is printed, opposite the names of each month, the figures 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, representing the first, second, etc., Sundays of the month. On joining the school the scholar is furnished a library card and ticket, filled up as indicated, and a copy of the library catalogue. He makes his selection of books desired at home, with the aid of parents or friends.

On entering the school on Sunday morning he deposits his book—the card being within—in the apartment appropriated to his class, and repairs to his seat; and thus of all the school.

After the school is opened the librarian restores the books returned to their several stalls in the library, and selects those desired; placing always the library ticket of the scholar in the place of the book, having first, with pencil, crossed the number thereon indicating the current Sabbath, and placing the library card in the book.

The card always accompanies the book; while the ticket always remains in the library, representing the book taken out.

Near the close of the school the librarian hands to the teacher the books for his class, which the teacher distributes to the scholars as the names on the cards in front of the books indicate.

This plan seems to us to embrace all the advantages set forth in behalf of "Ray's Patent," and in some particulars to be far preferable to it.

If we understand the working of the "patent check system," as explained, the scholar is not clearly identified with the book; examination of register is requisite, or the boy must come before the librarian with book in hand, while with our system the book and the boy are always identified. You have his entire registry on the card and ticket always at hand.

The ticket too, by the crossing of the current Sabbath, shows the date of issuing the book. How is this made to appear in the "patent system?" The date is often important, as in case of a lost book; and, be it recollected, this crossing of a single figure with the pencil is the sole entry the librarian makes in the entire and successful working of the library.

In simplicity and cheapness, we submit, our plan must claim superiority. In results of successful working we would like, Mr. Editor, to learn the facts in the use of the "patent system" and of others.

We have a library of one thousand five hundred and fifty volumes, from which for three years we have been giving out to our scholars an average each Sabbath of about seventy-five volumes, and during that three years we have lost less than a dozen books. Can you furnish better data? Give us the facts, Mr. Editor. If at least think ours is one of the best systems, and worthy the consideration of Sunday school workers. We inclose card and ticket of the form in use in

FELICITY SUNDAY SCHOOL.

NEW ORLEANS, October 12, 1874.

Sunday School Companion, Baltimore, Md.

"WHAT are you doing now?" asked a New England man upon entering Mr. ——'s studio in Rome unannounced. "Just at present," replied the sculptor, who was washing his hands, "I am performing requisite ablution." "Requisite ablution!" exclaimed the New Englander; "I never heard of such a statue; let's have a look at it!"

A SAILOR'S WIFE had just received intelligence that her husband had perished at sea. She was visited by a neighbor who sympathized with her on her loss, and expressed a fear that she would be poorly off. "Deed will I," said the widow; "but he did all he could for me—he's saved me the expense of his burying."

DO NOT MEASURE the piety of a man by the strength of his lungs.

FELICITY LIBRARY SYSTEM.

In another column is presented a statement of the library system in use for several years past in the Felicity Street Sunday school of this city, which is highly approved as one of the best systems of working the library now in existence.

Below we furnish a copy of the library ticket and library card now in use as the Felicity Library System.

We will furnish the library ticket and card, neatly printed on pasteboard, at $1 per hundred.

The True Economy.

The question is not how cheaply we can manage to keep soul and body together, but how can we bring both body and soul to the highest condition of vitality and power? To live is something more than to exist. How can we live most and best? How can we feed intellect and affection, conscience, sympathy, imagination, reverence, as well as the physical system? All pinching and restricting of diet is injurious in the long run. The bean-man, the bean-bread-man, the one-meal-a-day-man, the man who goes mousing about the world intent on cheapness, never makes the scales of power kick the beam. He wastes more than he saves. He checks an income, instead of stopping an outgo. The men who make the most ado over the petty prudencies of life, and perpetually obtrude their parsimonious practice on public notice, never amount to anything, or do anything of account. Man wants all he can use, assimilate, organize, reproduce. The things that strengthen and beautify his essential manhood, that enrich his sentiments and refine his sensibilities, that ennoble his intellect and enlarge the scope of his being and the horizon of his possibilities, belong to him by right, as the crown and purple belong to royalty.

Every man ought to aspire and labor to live generously, and have a comfortable and tasteful home, and surround himself and his family with everything that tends to increase health and happiness, and create an atmosphere of intelligence and refinement. Beauty, elegance, art, society, music, are our birthright. It is not waste to spend what one has for things that foster a noble pride, heighten self-respect, beautify the body and cultivate the mind. It is true economy that spends something for books and pictures, for occasional glimpses of nature, and the entertainment of the stage. The charities and humanities are not luxuries, that the poorest man on earth should deny himself of them. The loving, trustful, adorning sympathy that forgets his own wants and meager resources, and breaks the costliest thing it has on the head of the one beloved, is not a recklessness to be censured, but a devotion to be commended for its divine nobility. Saving may be nut-like and beaver-like, but sacrifice is God-like.—Herald of Health.

PRIMITIVE PLOWING.—A Mexican correspondent of the Louisville Courier-Journal writes:

"On our way back to Temisco we had an opportunity of observing, more closely than diligence or railroad can permit, the process of plowing, as commonly practiced in this country. The plow itself is almost a fac-simile of the pattern used by the Egyptians in the time of Abraham, and certainly commends itself to all agriculturists on account of its great simplicity and cheapness. It consists of a wooden shaft about four feet long and four inches thick, armed at its lower extremity with an iron point, slightly flattened, and sometimes presenting a feeble forward curve. The other end is provided with a round stick passed through a hole, to serve as a handle. The pole, consisting of the stem of a small tree from which the bark has been peeled, is fifteen feet long, and attached to the shaft by means of mortise and peg. The implement thus constituted is fastened at the extremity of the pole to the middle of a very light wooden yoke, about seven feet long, which rests immediately behind the horns of a pair of oxen, and is fastened there by thongs of rawhide passed around the roots of the horns. Not less than fifty such contrivances were crawling at a snail's pace over the field which we stopped to notice, scratching up the ground to the depth of two or three inches—certainly to us a very novel sight."

Romanism Political.

Whoever would understand Romanism must study its history in the past. Many excellent people are in favor of making almost unlimited concessions to it, believing it to be changed by time, experience, and by that vague influence which serves as servant-of-all-work in the philosophies of theorists—"the spirit of the age." Their mistake lies in this: that they regard Romanism merely as a set of theological opinions. It is that, but it is something more. It is belief in the absolute and divine right of the source of those opinions. Nothing is easier than for a man of the world, an adiaphorist of the present, to say: "The Romanist believes in transubstantiation, and the Lutheran in consubstantiation, and the Anglican in something more indefinite, which is neither. Each of the three has been intolerant and persecuting in days gone by. Why, since the other two have ceased to be intolerant and persecuting, may not the first have become so as well? What is there in the Roman doctrine likely to incline men to be bigoted and cruel?"

The flaw in the above reasoning is that these theological opinions are not, as opinions are in other bodies, the whole of the system of Romanism. Above them all—Mariolatry, image reverence, transubstantiation, purgatory, relics, confessions, and whatsoever else is usually called distinctive—is the doctrine that Rome has of right the absolute authority over all mankind—to wit: the allegiance of all who profess and call themselves Christians, and the right of conquest over all others.

And this will never suffer it to be still. It is possible to content other bodies when they have full toleration. There comes a time when the most pertinacious sectary feels that it is both unwise and unnecessary to force his views upon a reluctant public. He is content to practice them in peace, and bide his time.

But history, as we have intimated, shows that this has never been the case with Romanism. From the moment of the great outbreak of the Reformation, when the Western Church lost its Catholic character and became a sect, it has always treated the rest of Christendom as in rebellion. It has behaved just as the great monarchs of the middle ages toward their feudal dependents. When a vassal was strong they let him alone, and professed peace and friendship. When the great earl or count or baron was in difficulties they took the first opportunity to crush him. Its eye is steadily fixed, through all chaos and changes, upon absolute monarchy.

Now it is not easy for people to realize this who look at Romanism merely as a form of religion, and know it only by its externals. They may wonder at its strange character, and try to trace that to one or another of its usages. Those who are accustomed to view their own religion simply as the preferred one out of many permissible varieties can hardly see why Romanism should be so different. They ascribe it to the confessional, or to the celibate clergy, or to the imposing worship, or to some of the mere externals of the system. They can hardly understand why, in countries where the confessional is a burden that is feared and hated, where the clergy are celibate only in name, and where all the better classes despise and detest the greater part of the ceremonial, the spell of the Roman Church is as strong as ever.

It is history alone which can explain this. And that shows that the idea of the supremacy of the Roman see has been ingrained into the best thoughts of the adherents of Rome. It is the one article of the papal creed. It forbids the Romanist ever to acquiesce in the existence of any other belief one moment longer than it can be helped. Rome may draw back, may qualify, may give up demands, but this is only to last until it is safe to disavow the retraction.

It is simply to gain time on sufferance. The history of England shows that never was a chance given for the Romish influence to gain ground but it was seized upon, whether the seizure involved a breach of plighted faith, a violation of constitutional law or a solemn perjury. Romanists in England have been freely trusted, for the simple reason that they were not in this sense Romanists. They simply were men who retained the creed which prevailed before the Reformation. England was not papal then, was always anti-papal to a degree which would throw the present pontiff into a passion of rage, until the crisis of the Reformation came. Such influence as the Council of Trent has had elsewhere all over the continent has but faintly reached the English Romanists. But wherever it has, it has changed them, and for the worst.

We say that Mr. Gladstone is thoroughly right in his position, and that he is so because the belief of the Romish Church is that no authority, save its own, is permissible on earth. Let any one read the history of the struggle of the papacy with the empire, and the germs of this fixed idea will appear.

We know that these same pococurantists of whom we speak, say to this: "What of it? Suppose Rome has this belief—it can never push it to the old bounds." We reply: That may or may not be. It is not to be proved so easily that Rome has lost all power, simply because it has lost much; still less is it certain that it will never get it back. We do not feel over-confident, when looking at the spectacle of a half-educated people, with very dim and uncertain religious knowledge, and with a growing dislike of the old forms which once controlled it. We believe that if a nation can again be duped by Romanism, a very large part of the American nation is rapidly preparing itself to meet the wiles of the papacy half way.—The Churchman.

News of the Week.

DOMESTIC.

PHILADELPHIA, March 11.—The Woman's Medical College graduated sixteen women. The Jefferson College graduated one hundred and seventy doctors.

NEW YORK, March 12.—The Louisiana Congressional arbitration committee met here to-day. All the committee, except Mr. Frye, are present. It was decided that the committee deliberate in secret, and reporters were rigidly excluded. The proceedings to-day were confined to reviewing the election returns, and examination of poll lists and affidavits. The work was, in fact, only commenced, and not much progress may be expected until the arrival of Mr. Frye. Only such preliminary matters as his absence would not affect were passed upon. The session will not probably be very long.

Charles Mitchell died of yellow fever on the bark Gamohel, from Rio de Janeiro hither.

NEW YORK, March 13.—A morning paper says the prospects now are that, instead of an agreement between the Pennsylvania Central and Baltimore and Ohio roads, there will be a general railroad war in the course of a few weeks, in which rates will be cut to very low figures.

WASHINGTON, March 14.—A new feature is added to the Indian policy, namely: In distributing the supplies and annuities the agent is directed to require all able-bodied male Indians between the ages of eighteen and forty-five to perform service upon the reservation for the benefit of themselves or of the tribe, at a reasonable rate, to be fixed by the agent in charge, and to an amount equal in value to the supplies to be delivered.

The allowance provided for such Indians is to be distributed to them only upon condition of the performance of labor. The object is to make the Indian self-supporting. Congress incorporated in the Indian appropriation bill a section providing that hereafter no purchase of goods, supplies or farming implements, or any other article whatsoever, the cost of which shall exceed one thousand dollars, shall be paid for from the money appropriated, unless the same shall have been previously advertised and contracted for.

NEW YORK, March 15.—The Louisiana committee terminated its proceedings to-day. The claims of eighteen or nineteen contestants have been passed upon, and the award of the arbitrators is to be sent to the Governor at New Orleans to-night. Subsequent action on it will be as is deemed expedient by the Governor and House of Representatives.

PORT JERVIS, March 15.—A flood is regarded as inevitable. Two or three million dollars' worth of property is endangered. The blasting of the ice progresses.

PHILADELPHIA, March 15.—The ice in the Delaware is honey-combing and sinking. The gorge in the Schuylkill will soon be a thing of the past.

MOBILE, March 15.—A special just received says: Rienzi was visited at one o'clock to-day by a terrible tornado, lasting half an hour and destroying a number of buildings. Among the number the Presbyterian and Baptist churches.

WASHINGTON, March 16.—The Senate, by a vote of 33 yeas to 30 nays, postponed further consideration of the resolution for the admission of Pinchback till the second Monday in December next.

The result in the Senate to-night occurred upon motion of Mr. West. The point seems to be that the called session of the Louisiana Legislature will be estopped from the election of a senator, and the issue at the opening of the next session will be between Pinchback and McMillan. Pinchback is satisfied with the result.

NEW YORK, March 16.—A Guadalajara (Mexico,) letter of the twentieth ultimo contains an account of an earthquake of more than usual force, which on the eleventh of February shook a large portion of northern Mexico. The little town of San Cristobal was almost entirely destroyed, and seventy dead bodies were taken from the ruins. The center of this disturbance appears to have been the volcano of Cebaruco. The earthquake occurred at night, and the terror of the people was increased by the darkness.

OMAHA, March 16.—The storm which commenced yesterday raged all day to-day. Railroad trains east and west are behind time. It is stated that one of the eastern roads is blockaded. The weather is intensely cold.

COLUMBIA, March 16.—A fearful tornado passed over the lower part of Richland district yesterday. A house was blown down, two persons killed and several badly wounded. Trees were uprooted and twisted.

FOREIGN.

CITY OF MEXICO, March 1.—Gabriel Mancera and Vicente Sarla Forres have been appointed commissioners to represent Mexico at the Philadelphia Centennial Exhibition.

The church party are fomenting trouble with the view of organizing a revolution, using as their pretext the expulsion of the Sisters of Charity. The ill feeling between the Catholics and Protestants continues. Groups in the streets of Acapulco shout: "Death to the Protestants." The latter fear further violence, and numbers of them are preparing to emigrate. The American assassinated in Acapulco was named Henry Morris; he was from Boston. Minister Foster is making a collection for his destitute family.

LONDON, March 11.—The Berlin correspondent of the Telegraph says Germany has asked Italy whether she will continue to exempt the Pope from the obligations of law, and complains that he is now abusing the liberty given him for the purpose of fomenting rebellion in Germany.

HAVANA, March 11.—Captain General Valmaseda has issued a proclamation in which he says: "Additional reinforcements will soon arrive from Spain, and with the aid of the people, under the battle-cry of 'Spain, religion and the King,' Cuba will be saved."

At a reception given to the Captain General he said he desired that the grievances of foreigners should be brought to his personal notice, that he might be enabled, whenever possible, to arrange such cases without a lengthy correspondence.

The insurgents have burned several plantations in the sugar districts, and have defeated a small Spanish column in the jurisdiction of Santa Clara.

LONDON, March 14.—Revs. Moody and Sankey continued their revival services at Agricultural Hall, Islington, to day. The attendance was immense and is estimated at seventeen thousand. Women were present at the afternoon meeting, and in the evening twenty thousand men were assembled.

PARIS, March 15.—The Assembly to-day elected the Duke d'Audiffret Pasquier its president. The number of votes cast was 598, of which the duke received 418.

The Meaning of the Civil Rights Act.

There appears to be a confused idea as to the civil rights act. The act provides simply that all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall be entitled to full and equal enjoyment of accommodations, advantages, facilities and privileges of inns, public conveyances on land or water, theaters and other places of public amusement, subject only to conditions and limitations established by law, and applicable alike to citizens of every race and color, regardless of any previous condition of servitude.

The act does not embrace churches, schools, cemeteries, restaurants, barrooms, mercantile establishments or any other business than those enumerated in the act. And even as regards inns, public conveyances and places of public amusement, there is no question but that the law is unconstitutional, null and void. In the sixteenth Wallace Reports, page 74, the Supreme Court of the United States declares that the distinction between citizenship of the United States and citizenship of a State is clearly recognized and established by the fourteenth amendment, and that the rights which belong to a citizen of the United States as such are protected by this amendment, while the rights of the same person, which pertain to him in virtue of his State citizenship, are not protected by the amendment, but remain under the protection and control of the State government only. The language of the court is: "Of the privileges and immunities of the citizens of the United States, and of the privileges and immunities of the citizens of the State, and what they respectively are, we will presently consider; but we wish to state here it is only the former which are placed by this clause under the protection of the Federal constitution, and that the latter, whatever they may be, are not intended to have any additional protection by this paragraph of the amendment. If, then, there is a difference between the privileges and immunities belonging to a citizen of the United States as such, and those belonging to the citizens of the State as such, the latter must rest for their authority and protection where they have heretofore rested, for they are not embraced by this paragraph of the amendment." The court also say "that with a few exceptions—such, for instance, as the prohibition against ex post facto laws, bills of attainder, and laws impairing the obligation of contracts—the entire domain of the privileges and immunities of citizens of the States, as above defined, lies within the constitutional and legislative powers of the States, and without that of the Federal government; and the court hold that the fourteenth amendment makes no alteration in this particular."—Mobile Register.

THE transcript in the case of Isham Brown (colored,) who was tried and convicted of the murder of John W. Clinton, in St. Helena parish, and sentenced to be hung, having arrived at the executive office, the Governor gave it minute consideration, and, seeing no palliating circumstances surrounding it, has concluded to put the sentence into execution.

The death warrant was yesterday made out, and Friday, the sixteenth of April, selected for the day of execution, the place to be determined by the sheriff of the parish.

The murder of young Clinton took place in December last, and Brown, the murderer, fled to the city, where he was arrested and subsequently taken back for trial.

The jury which found him guilty was composed of six white men and six negroes. The testimony was conclusive, and an unqualified verdict was rendered in accordance. The trial began on the second instant, and on the tenth the sentence of death was passed upon the criminal by Judge Kemp, at Greensburg, St. Helena parish.—Picayune, March 17.

TO ENDEAVOR to work upon the vulgar with fine sense is like attempting to hew blocks with a razor.

THE Interior earnestly advocates more "expository preaching," as follows:

What prevents our ministers from adopting, more generally than they do, the practice of expository preaching? It is the most profitable, they will all say. They would much prefer it. What is in the way? The people look for a "regular sermon." Are we, then, under "bondage," after all? A minister in an important charge once told us that his time was so taken up writing sermons that he actually had no time to study the word of God. That was a strong statement, but we can readily believe that, if a minister had the idea that two elaborately prepared "discourses" were expected from him every week, he would subordinate everything to the attainment of that end. If the churches make this demand, the sooner they know how ruinous it is to their ministers the better. The man who makes two new sermons (in the usual sense of the word sermon) every week is necessarily limited in his reading. What he reads will bear directly on the sermons he means to produce. He will have no opportunity, or very little, for general scholarship; he will have no time for digging deeply into any one subject. Thorough, masterful investigation, under such circumstances, is out of the question. And the consequence will be that all through life his opinions will only be half formed. He will falter when he thinks he treads most firmly. Let him adopt the method of preaching one textual or topical discourse on the Sabbath, and let the second service be expository. Then he will be necessarily led to study carefully, critically whole books of the Bible. Questions regarding difficult passages will be settled, and a mass of ready and available knowledge of Scripture will be gathered week by week, which otherwise he never would have had. Time is saved. There is no looking for texts; the text is provided weeks ahead; no hunting up and down creation for illustrations, and what not, to fill up the time; the matter is all in the text. Only interpret the word of God, and very little extraneous matter need be called in. It is not necessary to parse every sentence, or expound every word, or amplify every expression. It is not a minister's business to make a commentary; and of all commentaries the commentary sermon is the driest. Let the leading idea or ideas of the chapter be selected, and made the main subject of discourse; and in same cases the rest of the chapter will come in naturally under subordinate heads. Robertson's Lectures on Corinthians give one a good idea about making expository sermons. The church must come back to this mode of preaching, if men are to retain their knowledge of the Bible; and we believe that in the hands of a man who has ordinary fluency, and can pass easily from point to point in an "off-hand" discourse, that this style of sermon can be made as interesting as any; as it is perhaps, on the whole, the most profitable of all.

THE venerable Thurlow Weed, in a recent letter to the Tribune on political affairs, thus adverts to some of the social extravagances of New York at the present time:

"There are ten thousand New York ladies whose costumes, when in full dress, cost at least $1,000 each. Fifteen years ago the same number of fashionable ladies would have appeared adorned quite as attractively at an average expense of $250. Ten thousand children under ten years of age are elaborately and fantastically arrayed at an expense of from $100 to $150 each, while the children of wealthy citizens fifteen years ago were simply but appropriately attired at an expense of $20 or $25. And it is painful to reflect that in consequence of this lavish expenditure upon a class that never earned a dollar, there are other tens of thousands without employment, and suffering for fuel, food and raiment. And last, though not least, are the millions of gold sunk by Americans who idle away both their time and their money in Europe. Ireland is not now the only country demoralized by absenteeism. These great abuses and follies reformed, nothing would be easier than the resumption of specie payments."

LONG PREACHING.—"There is nothing," says Jay, of Bath, in his recently published autobiography, "there is nothing against which a young preacher should be more guarded than length."

"Nothing," says Lamont, "can justify a long sermon. If it be a good one, it need not be long; and if it be a bad one, it ought not to be long."

Luther, in the enumeration of nine qualities of a good preacher, gives as the sixth "that he should know when to stop."

Boyle has an essay on patience under long preaching. This was never more wanted since the commonwealth than now, in our own day, especially among our young divines and academies, who seem to think their performances can never be too much attended to.

"I never," says Jay, "err this way myself but my convictions always lament it; and for many years after I began preaching I never offended in this way. I never exceeded three-quarters of an hour at most. I saw one excellency was within my reach—it was brevity—and I determined to attain it."

A FRIEND cannot be easily known in prosperity, nor can an enemy be easily hid in adversity.

THE Northern Christian Advocate has an article on "Church-Racing" as affecting missions, which is worthy of consideration. It says:

That there is too much of this denominational "racing" for the general good of Christianity is becoming a widespread and permanent conviction of the Christian mind. The liberalizing influence of Christian civilization has passed beyond denominational bounds, and demands, in the spirit of the age, the union and harmony of true Christianity in their workings; and the lack of this spirit by the denominations is and has been a reproach and obstacle to the reception of the gospel by intelligent and liberal men of the world. We are glad to record the fact of an increasing ascendency of the interests of Christianity, broad and true, over those of a local and limited character. The Christian mind is being educated more and more beyond and above denominational restrictions, and is looking beyond the particular to the grand and harmonious whole of the glorious gospel of the ever-blessed God. "Church-racing" is giving place to the majestic march of the "sacramental hosts of God's elect," united as one grand army for the conquest of the world. Their corps banners and uniforms are becoming so well known that they need no more mistake each other for enemies, and pour their fire into friends, instead of foes. Such mistakes are sad disasters, whether in the armies of the State or Church. They never fail to produce confusion and weakness in the army; and give the enemy advantages, and the right suffers.

These blunders, we blush to confess, have been more frequent in the army of the church militant than in any other, and they have generally been chargeable to the army leaders, rather than to the panic of the privates. In church matters these things, we are happy to believe, are passing away. The Lord's watchmen are seeing more clearly, "eye to eye," and they are uniting in the valleys, and shouting from the mountain-tops to each other with friendly voices; and as the union is perfected, and when it shall be perfected, and not before, will the triumphal song ascend: "The kingdoms of this world have become the kingdoms of our Lord and his Christ, and he shall reign forever and ever." The time for "church-racing" in the sense of denominational rivalry, resulting in the injury of each other, and the greater injury of Christianity, is gone, surely it is gone. Let the time past of such folly suffice. Denominational rivalry has crippled Christianity sufficiently in thousands of localities in our land. All denominations have been guilty of the folly. No one can charge another with being the leader in the strife.

REV. NEWMAN HALL, in the Independent, photographs John Bright while delivering his recent speech at Manchester:

"He is somewhat under the average height, with broad shoulders, large, round head, with hair now silvered with years, and a countenance in which you are in doubt whether firmness or tenderness predominates. He arranged a few pages of notes on his hat, which stood on the table at his side, and then, with his left hand generally held behind him and his right hand in gentle action, he spoke for upward of an hour and a quarter, to an audience breathless with interest, except when bursting forth in manifestations of approval and delight. Mr. Bright speaks with great deliberation. There is no hesitation, but there is no hurry. He never pauses as if in difficulty to find his words; but he brings them out with thoughtful care, as if weighing well the meaning and force of each one before it is uttered. And he may well be deliberate, for at the table below him one hundred and fifty reporters were seated, taking every syllable as it fell from his lips. Before the speech was finished the first part of it was already in type, and read by some of the audience. The telegraphic wires were flashing his sentences all over the world before he resumed his seat.

AN ENTERPRISING WOOD-SAWYER.—Emerson Wight, elected recently, most unexpectedly to himself and friends, to the mayoralty of Springfield, commenced life as a wood-sawyer. He had the contract with the Western railroad, now Boston and Albany, to saw the wood required on their engines, and, as coal was not used in those days, the job was no small one. With a portable horse-power and one or two assistants, he moved from station to station, and, by untiring industry, kept the locomotives supplied, gained the good will of his employers, and put money in his purse. Unluckily, when off his guard one day, he fell upon the track before an approaching engine, and both his legs were cut off below the knee. After a short confinement he was out again and about his business as lively as ever, having supplemented his pedal extremities with a pair of cork legs. His good common sense and thorough business qualities, which had a permanent location at the other extremity of his body, have given him, at about the age of fifty, a sufficient fortune, and the deserved appreciation of his fellow-citizens. He has served two terms as a representative in the Legislature, held various offices in the city government, and will do honor to the position to which he has just been called.—Boston Transcript.

The Awful Benediction.

General Steenbock commanded the Swedish army which, in 1713, reduced the city of Altona to ashes. In order to avert this calamity from the city a deputation was sent to the general, at the head of which was seen the Lutheran minister, John Sasse, who, on appearing before Steenbock, went down on his knees, and for the sake of Jesus' wounds sued for mercy in behalf of the city. Spurning the clergyman away, he exclaimed: "For the sake of the wounds of Jesus the Russians gave no quarter to a single Swede." Sasse, however, determined not to be repulsed, endeavored at the last interview to prevail upon the enraged general to adopt more pacific principles. But all his prayers and intercessions proved unavailing. Steenbock pleading that he was acting under orders from his superiors, Sasse said, in a firm tone of voice: "If that be the case, if you must apply the torch to the ill-fated city, according to the command of your superiors, while yourself are innocent of the dreadful deed, take hence with you, upon your conscience, the blessing of that Lord who will one day be the judge of us all!" and with that he blessed the general in that awful hour with that well-known benediction: "The Lord bless thee and keep thee," etc.

Steenbock trembled and quivered under this benediction; yet, notwithstanding, he executed his horrible design. But from that very hour, like General Tilly (who during the thirty years' war had laid waste the city of Madgeburg with inhuman cruelty,) nothing but misfortunes befel him, and the close of the Swedish war in Germany saw their general ground his arms and surrender himself with his whole army prisoners of war to the Danes, near Tonningen. Some time after Steenbock himself died in prison. On his dying couch he said to the clergyman who administered the sacrament to him: "No curse, of all those with whom I have waged war, rests with such weight upon my soul as the benediction of that minister; it will continue to torture me even in my dying moments, for it proved to me the source of dreadful consequences!"

THE death of Sir Charles Lyell, at the age of seventy-seven, is announced through the ocean cable. He graduated at Oxford, having been a member of Exeter College in 1819. Soon after his graduation he entered upon the study of law, which he afterward abandoned for the study of science, in whose pursuit he made his world-wide reputation. He published the first volume of his "Principles of Geology" in 1830, and greatly enlarged it and increased its value in 1838. In 1842 his "Travels in America" was published. Since then he had published various papers until 1863, in which year appeared his latest work, "The Geological Evidence of Antiquity in Man," in which he announced his acceptance of the Darwinian theory.

THE New York Tribune, in an able article on the civil rights bill, after stating that there is little left in this depraved bill which has any practical value, says:

It contains a jury clause which violates the constitution and common sense—for what? Why, to secure suitors the inestimable privilege of a trial before the most ignorant and incompetent jurors obtainable. It contains other clauses, ostensibly framed so as to secure the colored people certain rights in public conveyances, theaters, restaurants and hotels, but really intended to enforce nothing but that sort of social equality which knows no law except prejudice and custom, and can never be established by all the congresses and courts in Christendom.

TO THE MEMBERS OF THE MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.—The Minutes of our late Conference have just been issued from the press, and are being mailed to subscribers. All who have not subscribed will please send their orders either to Rev. John A. Ellis, at Meridian, or to myself, at Jackson. We will sell them at twenty-five cents per copy. Some of the brethren have subscribed liberally. All the proceeds above actual cost of publication will be donated to East Mississippi Female College. By purchasing the Minutes you patronize a worthy Christian institution.

TRIFLES.—Michael Angelo was one day explaining to a visitor at his studio what he had been doing to a statue since his previous visit.

"I have retouched this part, polished that, softened this feature, brought out that muscle, given some expression to this lip, and more energy to that limb."

"But these are trifles," remarked the visitor.

"It may be so," replied the sculptor; "but recollect that trifles make perfection, and perfection is no trifle."

WE MOVE a vote of thanks, says the New York Methodist, to Bishop Peck. He is dealing with the question of fraternity in the most straightforward and sensible manner. Having held his Conference at Portsmouth, Virginia, he went over to Richmond. Here, says a correspondent of the Methodist Advocate, he "had hardly been settled in his comfortable home before four of the city pastors of the Methodist Episcopal Church South called on him—Drs. J. E. Edwards and J. C. Granberry, and the Rev. Messrs. Woodward and Vanderslice. This was a graceful act, and all the more so as Granberry and Vanderslice tendered the Bishop their churches for morning and evening service. The latter minister has outstripped his brethren in the race of love, he having, some time back, tendered our minister, the Rev. J. P. Otis, his church for the Bishop's use, and exchanged pulpits with Mr. Otis, whose people now worship in a humble hall, but who are engaged in erecting a church in a locality of the city where a house of worship is needed. The Bishop preached an able sermon in Sidney church on Sunday morning, and dined with its pastor, Mr. Vanderslice. He then went to the Sunday school of our church and gave an impressive address, from which he went to supper with Dr. Granberry, for whom he preached in Broad Street Methodist Episcopal Church South at night."

On the following day the Bishop visited the preachers' meeting and called on the Governor of the State, in both instances being most courteously received. This is a far better way than threatening "strychnine and cannon," "thundering all along the line," as some one advises. The more such expressions are thought of the more one is ashamed of them.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN INDIA.—The India Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church was held in Shahjehanpore, India, commencing January 6. Rev. T. J. Scott, D. D., was elected president, and J. D. Brown and B. H. Badley, secretaries. Business proceeded with the usual dispatch and harmony.

The statistics show a healthy increase in all departments of our work, and are as follows: Church members, 1,145; probationers, 778; local preachers, 37; baptisms, children, 261—adults, 259; missionary collections, $725. Our Sunday schools have increased considerably the past year. Scholars of all ages in our Sunday schools now number 5,438. These are nearly all children of Hindoos and Mohammedans. How I wish the readers of the Christian Advocate could hear these children sing Christian hymns in their own language, or hear them repeat verses of Scripture, aye, and with more readiness, too, than many Sunday school children in America can do!

The number of day schools is 217; of these 121 are for boys and 96 for girls. The word of God is taught in all these schools to more than eight thousand children, of whom about one-fourth are females. It must be remembered that these statistics do not include those of the Bombay and Bengal mission, which will be duly forwarded by the superintendent, Rev. William Taylor.

The Conference was compelled, very reluctantly, to suspend Rev. Albert Norton, of the Bombay and Bengal mission, for one year, for disobedience to the order and discipline of the church. Bro. Norton refuses to organize Methodist churches, and has been raising money in this country and at home for his work, which he refuses to put under the control of the superintendent.—Correspondent of New York Christian Advocate.

HA! HA!—The Rev. Dr. Parker, the eloquent and far-famed London preacher, invited the Rev. Mr. Freemantle, of the Established Church, to preach in the City Temple, one of the great nonconformist churches of England. The invitation was accepted. But the Bishop of London heard of the expected outrage and dropped upon the whole thing like an arctic night. Mr. Freemantle thereupon backed out of the engagement, but came on the day appointed, stood at the foot of the pulpit and apologized for not being able to preach. This is enough to set all Christendom in a roar of laughter. Even our lethargic nature is moved to an irrepressible smile. If we had got as far as Freemantle did—to the foot of the pulpit—we would have been tempted into it, though everything split. We contend that neither the Bishop of London nor any other dignitary has a right to make a minister sacrifice his manhood. We hope that Mr. Freemantle's mantle will not fall on any one else. Indeed we think Mr. Freemantle's name is a misnomer, and for the reason that his mantle does not seem to be free. But perhaps in the same circumstances we would have done as he did, since the State and Church are there locked in each other's arms. Such scenes as above described will help on the day of divorcement. The Rev. Dr. Parker appropriately read, on the disappointing occasion just spoken of, the psalm on brotherly love: "It is like the precious ointment upon the head, that ran down upon the beard." Let somebody get a whole tank of that precious ointment and dip the Bishop of London into it!—Christian at Work.

THE NAME SO SWEET.

When life's brief day is closing,
Its sun declining fast,
And all familiar objects
But lengthening shadows cast,
And by the brink of Jordan
I stand with tottering feet,
Then talk to me of Jesus,
The name that is so sweet.

Death may assume an aspect
Of terror and of gloom
And cause weak, trembling nature
To shudder at the tomb;
Yet Jordan's icy billows
Shall serenely chill my feet,
If in that hour you whisper
The name that is so sweet.

The name, so dear and precious,
Indeed aark shall prove,
Which tide nor wave nor billow
From death my feet shall move;
Clinging thereto, how calmly,
My eyes shall close in sleep,
With life's last breath repeating
The name that is so sweet.

And so when I am dying,
And kindly glows life's flame,
Do not forget to mention
That sweet and heavenly name;
Perchance my soaring spirit
Its precious sense shall keep,
Till in my home in heaven
I hear that name so sweet.

Christian Experience.

MR. EDITOR: It will be acknowledged by all Christians that a true Christian experience is of vital importance to the salvation of the soul of every rational man and woman on earth; and also that, as there is but one Lord, one faith and one God and Father of all, there is but one sound and true Christian experience. Now in the fear of God, and with an eye to the salvation of precious immortal souls, we propose to show to the readers of the NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE what a true Christian experience is. Now we hold, and will prove by the Scriptures and the experience of many living Christians, and by reason and common sense, that a sound and true Christian experience consists in two things, namely: 1. A knowledge of sins forgiven. 2. A knowledge of the time and place this work was done.

1. We will prove this to be implied in a true Christian experience from the oracles of God. All converted to God in the days of Jesus Christ and his apostles knew both the time and place of their conversion. The man sick of the palsy knew both the time and place of his conversion. The place was in a house in Capernaum; the time was while Jesus was in that house and "preached the word unto them."—Mark ii, 5. St. Paul knew the time and place of his conversion. The place was in the house of Judas, on the street called Straight, in the city of Damascus; at the time Ananias was in that house, laid his hands on him, and the scales fell from his eyes, and he was "filled with the Holy Ghost."—Acts ix. The three thousand on the day of Pentecost knew the time and place of their conversion. The place was the city of Jerusalem; the time was the day of Pentecost.—Acts ii. Cornelius and his family knew the time and place of their conversion. They were converted in the house of Cornelius, at the time Peter preached in that house, and "the gift of the Holy Ghost was poured out upon them."—Acts x. The Samaritans knew the time and place of their conversion. They were converted in the city of Samaria, at the time Peter and John laid their hands on them, and they received the gift of the Holy Ghost.—Acts viii. The eunuch, Lydia, the Philippian jailer, and all we have any account of in the New Testament, knew the time and place of their conversion to God.

2. We will prove it by the experience of thousands of living witnesses now living in some branch of the Christian church, who testify and say: We know the time and place of our conversion to God. Some were converted when they were quite young, others in middle age, and others in old age; but all their experiences agree in this one thing: they know the time and place of their conversion to God. Why is this so? Because true conversion to God is the same thing all over the world, and in the different branches of the church of God. All true Christians have the very same religion and Christian experience in the matter of their conversion; they know they are converted, and they know the time and place it was done. Their Christian experience exactly agrees with the experience of all converted to God in the days of Christ and his apostles. Therefore it is a true gospel Christian experience.

3. We will prove this to be true Christian experience by reason and common sense. Reason and common sense say that if a man has sense enough to know that he is converted to God, and to know he loves God, he has sense enough to know the time and place God converted him, and when he first commenced to love him. And if a man who is rational, professes to be converted and to love God, does not know the time and place of his conversion, and does not recollect the time he first commenced to love him, reason says that is proof that he is a deceived man, and is not converted to God; because we think that conversion to God, and the time and place of conversion, are inseparably connected; they cannot be separated, and hence they are always connected together when conversion is spoken of by the inspired writers in the Holy Scriptures. If a man is converted in time (and not in eternity, as some have said and taught,) there must have been a day or hour in time when he was converted; and if he has sense to know that the work is done, he has sense to recollect the time it was done; and if he occupies some place in time when converted, he was converted at some place in time; and if he has sense to remember his conversion, he has sense to remember the place of his conversion; and therefore it follows that a man converted to God knows the time and place of his conversion. And this is true gospel Christian experience. "But hold," says an objector. "I hold that a man is not required to know the time and place in order to know that he is a child of God." Prove that, and we have two different Christian experiences; and as the New Testament knows but one, it is impossible for both to be right; and if you will prove your experience right, I will have to give up my own experience—the experience of thousands and tens of thousands of living witnesses now on earth, and the experience of all converted in the days of Christ and his apostles, renounce the Bible and turn infidel, concede the point in discussion, and give up the argument. You say: "Be calm; don't be so excitable, and I will prove it." Well, then, give us the proof. Here it is: "If I have not misunderstood you, your doctrine amounts to this: If a man does not know when and where he was born (of the flesh) of course he was never born at all. Then we have a large number of persons in the world who never were born at all, because they know not the time and place of their birth; and yet these persons live, and the question would naturally arise how they came into being?"

Now, Mr. Editor, all we have to do to prove to your intelligent readers that this is a worthless and absurd argument is to show them its fallacy, which is very easily detected. Its fallacy lies in this: It confounds adult intelligence with unconscious infancy. An infant has not sense enough to know the time and place of its natural birth, and therefore it cannot tell it unless some person has told it where and when it was born. But this is not the case with an intelligent adult; he has sense enough to know the time and place of his spiritual birth himself, without being told by other persons where and when he was born of the Spirit. Therefore to confound adult intelligence with unconscious infancy in argument is illogical, and consequently absurd. This argument does this, and therefore it is an absurd and worthless argument. It reminds me of the ignorance of Nicodemus when he came to our Lord by night; he was totally ignorant of the spiritual birth of which our Lord spake.

In conclusion permit me to say that it may be possible that some, when first converted, may not at that time claim it for conversion, because it was something different to their idea of conversion; but they will know that they never felt such happiness in all their life before, and if they continue faithful to God he will increase their happiness so as to remove all doubt from their minds of their conversion, and the time and place it was done. Others when converted may have no doubts about the matter, but after awhile satan may tempt them so as to cause them to doubt it, and then their minds are darkened, and their souls are in trouble for many days, and perhaps for months, for they may be "slow to gather up the proper evidence" of their conversion to God; but they go to God in prayer and tears, and their minds go back to the time and place of their first love, and God gives them again the proper evidence of their conversion, and leaves them no longer alone to gather it up themselves, which is impossible for them to do.

Again, it is said that "some love God, but cannot tell when they first began to love him." This is true in a natural sense, but in a spiritual sense we believe it is false. There is a natural love and there is a spiritual love, and these are as different as nature and grace. A woman who is a sinner may love her child, and love and admire the lovely character of Jesus, with her natural affections, and be a sinner still; but when she is changed by the power of God from nature to grace, then she loves God with all her soul, spiritually; but not before, because that is a moral impossibility. When this spiritual change takes place, so as to enable her to love God spiritually, she will know it, and know the time and place it was done. Be not deceived on this point by mistaking natural love of God for spiritual love. If you ever love God spiritually you will be certain to recollect the time and place you first began to love him. The doctrine that denies this we pronounce a false and dangerous doctrine, because its tendency is to deceive the people and cause them to lose their souls by making them believe that they are in the high way to heaven, when they are in the broad way to hell. Therefore ministers of the gospel of Jesus Christ ought not to preach it. Those who do preach it I would admonish, in the name of Jesus Christ, to preach it no more, but go to the Lord in prayer and tears, and continue to pray and weep until he converts your soul. After this is done, my word for it, you will never preach nor write again that a man may love God and enjoy religion, and not know the time and place of his conversion to God.

An Educated Ministry.

MR. EDITOR: With your kind permission I would be glad to ask the Bishops and leading intellects of our church a few questions, the answers to which, I feel confident, will be read with profound interest by your entire list of country readers. Apropos, I wish to know if the Annual Conference deems it right and proper to receive on trial any applicant for membership, without regard to educational qualifications, and place him in charge of a circuit the first year? An old aphorism, received among the first lessons of my childhood, suggests itself to my mind just here: "Anything that is worth doing at all is worth doing well." If this be true in any sense, it seems to me that its most potent meaning would apply to the doing of the will of our heavenly Father, obedient to the command: "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel." Does it ever occur to "the powers that be" in our church government that the progress of our organization can be greatly impeded, or, more plainly speaking, a good work almost completely torn down, by placing it in charge of an inexperienced and unqualified minister? I ask this question with all due respect for the feelings of our young ministers. I can truly sympathize with them in all their efforts, and would to-day myself be one of them if qualified to make the effort. But my mother always taught me: "Whatever you do, my son, do it well;" and with this sacred precept ever thundering in my ears, I feel that I would be guilty of the most presumptuous sin to undertake to teach the truth without several years of arduous and prayerful study prior to entering upon so important an undertaking. The mere artisans for temporal improvement always compel us to serve as an apprentice before allowing us to claim their trade as a journeyman. Now ought not workmen upon the great spiritual temple to be more careful in preserving unsullied the reputation of their church organization than men of the world are in shielding from danger the fair fame of their respective vocations? I would be glad to advance a few ideas on this subject; but, as there are so many others more able to do so, I prefer to hear from them. What is the duty of our Annual Conference in the premises? And, secondly, what is the duty of the membership of a circuit when the Conference sends them a young man wholly incompetent to discharge the duties of a pastor? In asking these questions I speak at least for one good circuit, and believe that I speak for a great majority of your plain country readers. Please give us some light on the subject.

YOUNG LAYMAN.

"GIVE me neither poverty nor riches."—Proverbs xxx, 8.

A part of Agur's very peculiar prayer. How different from many prayers of this money-loving and wealth-seeking age! Agur, about whom the Bible teaches us very little, was certainly a wise man, else he never would have prayed to be delivered from riches. He lived away back in the moonlight of the economy of grace. Nevertheless, he was wise. It does not require much wisdom—never did—to see the inconvenience of poverty; but to apprehend the awful responsibilities and the dreadful dangers attendant upon riches requires great wisdom, even "the wisdom that cometh down from above." Surely, then, Agur was an inspired man, or he enjoyed a very exalted degree of spiritual illumination as a man of God.

Agur understood, as some of us do not, that God is the great Giver of poverty and riches. Hence his prayer: "Give me neither poverty nor riches."

My poor brother, do you recognize that God, your gracious Father, is the Author of your poverty? If so, why are you so often discontented?

My rich brother, have you received your riches at the hands of him who is the Author of all good? Then why do you not give more liberally to his cause? Take care! He will ere long require of you a strict account of your stewardship. O it is a fearful thing to be rich! Riches increase cares, trials, sorrows, temptations and fearful responsibilities.

"Dangers stand thick through all the ground"

over which the rich have to walk, that tend to make them worldly-minded and to keep them back from heaven. Therefore our Savior taught: "How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of heaven." No wonder, then, that the wise and good Agur offered up his important and rather strange prayer.

Poverty likewise is attended by a cohort of cares, sorrows and fearful temptations which are exceedingly inconvenient, unpleasant and dangerous. I need not enumerate them, for many of us already know them well. They are to be dreaded, and, if possible, avoided.

Reader, have you, as a Christian, ever prayed, like ancient Agur, upon this all-important subject? Why not? Is it not your privilege and your duty? Join with your honest endeavors, in your honorable avocation, your earnest and daily petition in the form of Agur's prayer: "Give me neither poverty nor riches."

When your request is granted you will become one of that noble class of Christians—neither poor nor rich—who do most good in the world, live most happily here, and most surely and triumphantly make their way to the kingdom of heaven.

How to Pay the Minister.

Last week we considered the question how large a support a minister ought to receive. The conclusion was that he should receive more than the average income of the members of his flock. He should buy books, new books, in order to keep abreast of the learning of the times, and the books the scholar wants are generally expensive. He is commanded to be given to hospitality, and hospitality always implies expense. As his labors lie greatly among the poor, the calls upon his charity will be great. And last, in order to devote his energies wholly to his arduous and important work, he must be free "from worldly cares." All these considerations show that the pastor's salary should be greater than the average income of the families of his parish.

This conclusion is confirmed by the Sabbath school lesson for next Sunday. The Levites had no inheritance among the tribes of Israel. In order that they might devote their whole time to their spiritual functions they were freed from the necessity of earning their own livelihood. They were supported by the offerings made to God, and their support was a generous one. A large part of the sacrifices and offerings made to God was theirs. Although less than a tenth of the people, they received the tithe of all the productions of the land. In addition to this, cities were assigned to them for residence, with pasturage for their cattle. This was certainly a liberal provision for their comfort. And the Apostle Paul, in his first epistle to the Corinthians, announces the Levites as an example for the support of Christian ministers.

Why are not our ministers so supported? Why is it the followers of Christ, who have so many spiritual gifts to be thankful for, are not as generous in their provision for their religious teachers as were the Jews, who did not possess one-tenth of their religious privileges? This wondrous falling short is accounted for by three common and mischievous popular errors:

The first is that the leavings are to be given to religion. If, after a man has supported his family, sent his boys to college, and his girls to the seminary, and surrounded himself with the comforts of life, he has anything left, he can give something for the support of religion. He must buy his wife a new dress, himself a new coat, a horse for his son, and a piano for his daughter, and then he may give something "to the preacher," if he feels inclined. Or, to state it in unexaggerated language, he must first pay his debts, and then provide the necessary comforts of life for his family, and then contribute to the church. This is the popular idea, but it is not God's. He asks for the first fruits, not the last. The tithe was first to be paid. If it takes some comforts from the family, serve God first, and he will open his hand and fill their mouths with goodness. "Honor God with thy substance, and with the first fruits of all thy increase." It certainly is not honoring God first to make provision for paying our taxes and our debts, for providing for our comforts, and then giving a part of the remainder to him. We should give to God of the first, and not of the last. The dues to God should be paid; and only after they are satisfied should what is due to our creditors, our families and ourselves be afforded.

The next mistake is that the money used "for the support of religion" is "given to the preacher." If this is so, if we don't like the preacher we won't "give him" so much, or anything at all. If this is so no man of honor can enter the ministry; for no one who is able to work is willing to be dependent for his living on the gifts of others. This is a sad mistake. The servant, the embassador of God, is not supported by charity and alms. He is fed from the King's table. The Lord is "the inheritance" of Levi. It is not the Christian's duty "to give the preacher" anything. He does not require it; God will provide for him. He does not ask it. But God, who gives us all things, does ask us for our gifts. He commands it not for his sake, but for our sakes. It is not only a duty but a privilege and an honor to give to God. As he has no altars now from which our offerings may ascend, they are to be given to God through his ministers, his work and his poor. It is the business of every one to see how large a portion he can give to God, and then divide it as wisely as he can between the different causes and objects, at home and abroad. And whatever is given must be given willingly and cheerfully; for "God loveth a cheerful giver."

The third mistake arises from these two mistakes. The value of religion is underestimated, or rather is never thought of, so strong is the force of habit. Religious privileges and opportunities are so common in our land that we never think of their value. The importance that we attach to any subject is measured by the sum we are willing to give for it. And the question which every one may ask himself is: "How much am I willing to give for the glory of my God, for the spread of the gospel of my Savior, for hearing my gospel preached?" The father who has the means is willing to spend five hundred dollars a year to send a daughter to a fashionable school, that she may shine better in society. Does he care as much for the house of God, and the religious education of his whole family? The money test will answer. The confirmed smoker will spend ten dollars a year in filling his pipe, or fifty on his cigar-box; does he give as much to God? Sugar and coffee are not absolute necessities of life; they cost the poorest families nearly a dollar a week; and yet how many of these would regard a request to subscribe fifty dollars a year to religious causes as exorbitant? This plain, matter-of-fact, every-day view of the claims of God and his church upon our liberality is one that may be profitably surveyed.—Christian Observer.

Mr. Spurgeon's Sermons.

We find an article in the London Baptist upon "Twenty Years of Published Sermons." From it we make the following extract in relation to the circulation of Mr. Spurgeon's sermons in their printed form:

Many singular things have happened in connection with their publication, but the most of them have escaped my memory; the following, however, I may mention. One brother, whose name I must not mention, purchased and gave away no less than two hundred and fifty thousand copies. He had volumes bound in the best style, and presented to every crowned head in Europe. He gave copies containing twelve sermons to all the students of the universities, and to all the members of the two houses of Parliament, and he even commenced the work of distributing volumes to the principal householders in the towns of Ireland. May the good results of his laborious seed-sowing be seen many days hence. The self-denial with which this brother saved the expense from a very limited income, and worked personally in the distribution, was beyond all praise; but pride was ovaded, and observation dreaded by him; the work was done without his left hand knowing what his right hand did. In the first days of our publishing a city merchant advertised them in all sorts of papers, offering to supply them from his own office. He thus sold large quantities to persons who might otherwise never have heard of them. He was not a Baptist, but held the views of the Society of Friends. It was very long before I knew who he was, and I trust he will pardon me for here mentioning a deed for which I shall ever feel grateful to him. By my permission the sermons were printed as advertisements in several of the Australian papers, one gentleman spending week by week a sum which we scarcely dare to mention lest it should not be believed. By this means they were re[illegible] far away in the bush, and never were results more manifest, for numbers of letters were received in answer to the inquiry as to whether the advertisements should be continued, all bearing testimony to the good accomplished by their being inserted in the newspapers. A selection of these letters was sent to me, and made my heart leap for joy, for they detailed conversions marvelous indeed. Besides these, many epistles of conversions come to us of like character, showing that the rough dwellers in the wilds were glad to find in their scanty paper the best of all news—the story of pardon bought with blood.

In America the sale of the edition published there was extremely large, and I believe that it still continues, but dozens of religious papers appropriate the sermons bodily, and therefore it is quite impossible to tell where they go, or rather where they do not go. Of translations, the Dutch have been most plentiful, making large volumes. An edition of two volumes of selected sermons has been circulated in the colony of the Cape of Good Hope among the Dutch settlers of that region. In Germany there are three noble volumes, besides many smaller ones. German publishers, with the exception of Mr. Oncken, of Hamburg, seldom have the courtesy to send the author a copy, and I have picked up in divers places sermons bearing date from Baden, Basel, Carlsruhe, Ludwigsburg, and so on. How many, therefore, may have been sold in Germany I am unable to compute. In French several neat volumes have appeared. In Welsh and Italian one volume each. In Sweden a handsome edition in four volumes has been largely circulated, and the translator informed me of the conversion of some of noble and even of royal birth through their perusal. Besides these, there are single sermons in Spanish, Gaelic, Danish, Russ, Maori, Telugu and some other tongues, and permission has been sought and gladly given for the production of a volume in the language of Hungary.

Obituaries.

MRS. MARY MCCARY departed this life, in Mobile, on the fourth of March, 1875, in the fifty-third year of her age.

She had been a pious, devoted member of the church from her childhood. In widowhood, in poverty and sickness her consolation in Christ was abundant. She was confined to her bed by a lingering disease for many months. Her pastor always found her patient and trustful. A little while before her death she was asked by her eldest son if there was anybody that she wished to see. She asked that her pastor might be sent for, as she desired once more to receive the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. Her family and neighbors joined her in this solemn service. There was no gloom in this death chamber. On the contrary, it was a heavenly place, lighted up by the presence of him who conquered death.

"Have you put out the lights?" said she, as the shadow of death fell over her eyes. "No, the lights are still burning," was the answer. Then, calling her children and friends about her, she gave them her parting blessing, and begged them all to meet her in the better world. To her pastor, who inquired as to her readiness for the great change, her answer was: "I am ready. I have told you that all the time." To her friend Mrs. Clegg, who had been specially kind in her attentions to her, she expressed her gratitude and thankfulness, and then quietly fell asleep in Jesus. "Our people die well."

MRS. CATHERINE A. TATE, the subject of the following obituary, was born in Robertson county, North Carolina, October 1, 1810, and died December 15, 1874, at her residence in Tangipahoa parish, Louisiana. Her widowed mother, Mrs. Catherine McNeil, of precious memory, removed to this State with her family when Catherine was yet young. In 1832 she married Mr. George T. Hearsey, of New Orleans. The union was of short duration; and in 1835 she was again married, to Mr. Hugh D. Tate, whom she survived about twelve years.

At what age Sister Tate embraced religion and joined the Methodist Church the writer has not been able to ascertain; but he can testify that for more than thirty years he has known her to be an humble, consistent and earnest Christian. Her trials of faith and afflictions, both of body and mind, were frequent and severe, but out of all she came forth "more than conqueror."

Shortly before she passed away from earthly sufferings to her eternal reward she expressed a desire to see me, hear me talk of Jesus and his religion, and pray. Although she was not a member of my charge, yet I esteemed it to be an unusual privilege to comply with the request, and receive the dying testimony of one whom I had known so long and loved so well. I found her peaceful and trusting, ready and waiting to go home.

She requested me to write a short notice for the ADVOCATE, and say to the church that to the end the grace of our Lord sustained her; that she had "nothing whereof to glory save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ." "His grace sustains me now."

A few days more and the scene was closed. They were days of triumph. Contented and happy, she passed through the valley into the "rest that remaineth for the people of God."

TCHEVA GRANGE, NO. 182, met to-day pursuant to the call of our worthy master, M. T. Smith, for the purpose of paying the last mark of respect to our beloved and worthy brother, Rev. J. W. PURVIS, who died on Friday, February 19, 1875. The worthy master appointed Bros. W. M. Broadaway, M. R. Vancleave, W. T. Schell and Bonner Richardson a committee to draft resolutions of respect and sympathy for the family of our deceased brother. The committee offer the following report for final action by the grange:

Whereas, An inscrutable Providence has entered our grange by the hand of death in removing from our midst our highly esteemed and beloved brother, Rev. J. W. Purvis; be it, therefore,

Resolved, That as faithful laborers under the great Master of the universe we bow in humble submission to his will who doeth all things well, and we recognize his right to do with his own as seemeth good in his sight.

Resolved, That in the removal from our midst of our worthy and beloved brother the grange has lost the counsel of a wise and prudent member, and society one of its brightest ornaments and most useful and valuable citizens, who hath obeyed the divine command, yea, to the full measure: "Feed the hungry, clothe the naked and minister unto the poor;" and, as a good shepherd, shall receive the reward from our Master above.

Resolved, That we tender to the family our deep and heartfelt sympathy for their great and irreparable loss; and the greatest comfort we can give is to assure them that their and our loss is his eternal gain.

Resolved, That the grange hall be draped in mourning, and the members wear the usual badge for thirty days; that a copy of these resolutions be sent to the bereaved family, a copy be spread upon the minutes of the grange, and that a copy be sent to the NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE and the Yazoo Banner for publication.

MRS. MARTHA LEWIS, daughter of the late Philip Spear, was born in Robertson county, North Carolina, October 10, 1801; was married to Quinea Lewis, September 22, 1816; and joined the Methodist Church, at Union Academy, on Pearl river, in June, 1822, under the ministry of Rev. Thomas Griffin. She was happily converted in March before she joined the church. She was her husband's sweet counselor, and his inseparable companion for fifty-seven years. A few years ago they celebrated their golden wedding—the first and only one given in this county. She raised ten children to be grown, six of whom still live. She has two sons in the Methodist ministry. She leaves about one hundred children and grandchildren. She sweetly fell asleep in Jesus, January 31, 1875, at her home near Holmesville, Mississippi.

"Aunt Patti," as she was familiarly called, was a woman of devoted piety. From the time of her conversion her views of divine truth were remarkably clear and intelligent, and her religious experience afforded unmistakable evidence of the Spirit's operations on her heart. To grow in grace and to discharge her duty as wife and mother seemed to be the one object of her life. She loved the house of God, and with her husband and children would often ride ten miles to attend church. Whoever else might be absent from class meeting or prayer meeting, "Aunt Patti" was always in her place, encouraging her pastor by her presence, and her fellow-Christians by her example. Her life has furnished a uniform testimony of the sincerity and depth of her piety. She walked with God." Her natural disposition was gentle and refined. The "law of kindness was in her tongue;" and during the many years we have known her we do not remember to have heard her utter a word of detraction or make an ill-natured remark respecting any human being. Humility was a prominent trait in her character; distrustful of herself, she seemed prayerfully to bring her faith and practice to the unerring standard of divine truth. Here she loved to drink of the waters of salvation; here she gathered strength for the duties and trials of the wilderness. She was often at the altar of prayer, and we can never forget the deep reverence, the tender humility, the filial confidence which marked her prayers, uttered as though alone with God. She has passed over the river, beyond the smiling and the weeping of earth, into the mansions of those that are saved by grace. Her aged and stricken husband is waiting by the river, ready himself to cross at the beckoning of the angel boatman.

ONE WHO KNEW HER WELL.

TEACHERS' BIBLES.—We cordially indorse the following concerning the beautiful Bibles lately issued by the American Tract Society:

"Every teacher, every Christian, should have his own Bible. It should be peculiarly his. Precious associations should build themselves all about it like colonies, peopling his religious life, holding the histories of his holiest thoughts, and treasuring up his entire Christian experience. It should be a clustering world to him; and he cannot begin too early to build these associations and histories around it. We know Christian workers whose Bibles are full of red-letter and golden texts, illuminating every page, and reflecting light upon every passage of their pilgrimage. That the teacher's copy of the Bible may be all this to him implies several requisites. It is to be a life-long companion, and must therefore be durable and portable, have good wear in it and be easily carried. It must be respectable-looking, for the owner's complacency in it—not a mean consideration. The text should be the most approved and accurate. The parallel references should be copious and pertinent. It should be, in short, the very best edition, intrinsically and extrinsically, and in every particular, procurable."

DIFFICULTY is the parent of success. Nitor in adversum was Burke's motto.

MUSIC THE DIALECT OF HEAVEN.

BY MRS. PHOEBE PALMER.

Ye singing seraphs, who surround
The throne of light ineffable,
And gloriously the praise resound
Of him in whose bright smiles ye dwell—

Say, are ye not by sweet constraint
Compelled by every glance ye take
To think each former note too faint,
And yet a loftier tone to wake?

O! could the depths of love be found,
Or angel minds conceive its store,
Then ye your ecstasies might bound,
And say how high your strains might soar.

But transports, ardors, so intense
As to bright seraph bosoms live—
How could they ever burst from thence
Did music not its utterance give?

For words are weak; we feel them weak
When the o'erpowering weight of bliss
Rests on the heart. Ah! who could speak
Of rapture so sublime as this?

But music! yes, that holy spell,
The language of yon sainted sphere—
In it we will our triumphs tell,
And its sweet voice our God will hear.

Long he its eloquence hath known;
His young creation with it rang;
When first yon morning heralds shone,
Together they his praises sang.

Then sweet, indeed, is that employ,
Taught by himself—his early choice.
Angels, with you we shout our joy,
In heaven-born music's cheerful voice.

Romish Pretensions.

Some time ago we drew attention to the pretensions of the Pope with reference to the subversion of civil governments, and cited in evidence the assertion of the Dublin Review, than which there is no higher Roman Catholic authority in the world of letters, to the effect that "the Pope, in virtue of his ecclesiastical office, has the power of deposing any sovereign whose government he may consider injurious to the spiritual welfare of that country."

The impudence of this claim is no security that it will never be attempted to be enforced. If the Romish Church has any distinguishing characteristic, it is that of the effrontery of its pretensions in matters spiritual and secular; but this does not prevent it from having a large following; nay, it is deliberately assumed in order to impress its followers with superstitious awe. The ignorant are soon reconciled with the most preposterous assumptions, when proceeding from what they conceive to be supreme authority, and even come to relish them. Rome makes its account of this natural tendency; and feeling strong in its ascendency over its devotees, and sure of its hold upon them through their superstition, their hopes and their fears, it boldly proceeds upon the principle that if nothing is claimed nothing is gained. Therefore it puts forth claims to many powers which are intrinsically absurd; and, its followers servilely but none the less heartily support them. It is impossible, indeed, to conceive of any claim so preposterous as that it will be disallowed by the class who make up the body of the Romish laity, if seriously urged by their ecclesiastical despots and conscience mongers.

And here lies the danger of pretensions which the educated, the intelligent and the thoughtful know to be absolutely without a basis in fact or reason. The mass of Romanists do not think; their thinking in all matters of this character is done for them, and is furnished ready-made by their priests, bishops, councils and popes. It is only necessary, then, for them to be backed by the numerical force that is necessary to make the most absurd pretensions of the Pope a possibility in any country where there is a following sufficiently numerous to be overpowering, whether by votes or force. The possibility may be only shadowy now in America, but it should not be forgotten that, though shadows may themselves be impalpable, they are invariably reflected by a solid body that is substantial and palpable enough to those who have eyes to see.

If the principles that underlie the pretensions of the Romish Church could be carried into practical effect there would be no security for civil liberty in any land, or for the existence of the government of any country whose influence the Pope might pronounce to be injurious to its spiritual welfare—that is, to the advancement of the Romish Church.

It will not do to scout these pretensions because of their absurdity or their apparent impossibility. Every Romanist of the Ultramontane school believes in them, and when it may be done with safety will be a ready instrument for reducing them to practice. On this very question hangs the peace of Europe to-day. And the supporters of the Pope do not hesitate to declare that no right, no personal or corporate liberty can stand against his claims. The following extract from the Schlesische Volks Zeitung, an Ultramontane organ known to be in direct communication with the Pope, foreshadows the papal policy toward Germany which, mutatis mutandis, may at any hour be applied to England or the United States. It says, and what it says needs no comment:

"We contend that the Pope has the right to depose sovereigns even now, and that he is likely to exercise this right in the future. Of course such a thing is not to be apprehended in Germany for the present. The German kings and sovereigns having been baptized in the name of God, they belong to the Pope, and in consequence are not likely to be deprived of their thrones by him. But supposing any of the German potentates were to become Turks or Unitarians, or to lead such an infamous life as a late elector of Hesso, who sold his subjects to fight England's battles in America, or as the Virgin Queen Elizabeth, the great female assassin, who murdered Catholics by the dozen; or supposing any of our princes were to forbid us to recognize a duly elected pope as the head of the church, or to try to convert us to the famous old Catholic creed, with Mr. Reinkens for mock pontiff; supposing, we say, anything of the kind were to occur, we really do not know why the Pope should not use the powers delegated to him, and send such princes to the right about. * * * If a pope finds that a dynastic firm has become bankrupt and lost the favor of Heaven, he is perfectly justified in sequestrating the business, and forbidding all whom it concerns to have any further dealings with the insolvent potentate."

If the assertions of these pretensions were confined to the newspaper press, even those which are known to reflect most accurately the policy of the hierarchy, it might be lightly treated as mere "sound and fury, signifying nothing." Such, however, is not the case, the language used by the Romish papers being based upon and strictly in consonance with the arrogant assumptions of successive popes, and representing an inflexible programme that has been held steadily in view by the hierarchy for generations. Thus Gregory the Seventh, in his famous bull of excommunication against Henry the Fourth, invokes the apostles, Peter and Paul, whose mantles he claimed to have fallen upon his shoulders, as follows:

"Now I beseech you, oh, most holy fathers and princes, cause that all the world may understand and know that if ye are able to bind and loose in heaven, ye are able upon earth to give and to take away empires, kingdoms, principalities, marquisates, duchies, countships and the possessions of all men according to the deserts of each. * * * If, then, ye judge spiritual things, what must not be believed of your power over worldly things? And if ye judge the angels who rule over all proud princes, what can ye not do to their slaves?"

Again, Innocent the Third, writing to the Emperor at Constantinople, repeated the same presumptuous claim, thus:

"Thou shouldest know that God created two lights in the firmament, the sun and the moon—that is, he created two dignities, the papal authority and the kingly power. But the former, which is set over the days—i. e., the spiritual things—is the greater; that set over the things of the flesh is the smaller; and there is the same difference between popes and kings as there is between the sun and moon."

And again, the same Pope, in the bull accepting the vassalage of King John, and vouchsafing the protectorate of Rome to England, declared:

"That both kingship and priesthood are established within the church—to the end that the kingdom may be sacerdotal, and the priesthood royal; that as every knee must bow to Christ of things in heaven and things on earth—that there may be one fold and one shepherd; and hence temporal kings are not to be acknowledged as having rightful authority, unless they study to serve with true devotion this representative of Christ's kingly and priestly power."

Lastly, Pope Boniface the Eighth, in his bull Unam sanctum, declared the teaching of the gospel to be as follows:

"That the Pope has two swords, the spiritual and temporal; the one to be wielded by the church, the other for the church; the one by the priesthood, the other by kings and soldiers, but this only on the hint or the sufferance of the priest. One sword, however, must be under the other, and the temporal authority must be subject to the spiritual power. As saith the apostle: 'There is no power but of God; the powers that be are ordered—i. e., set in order—of God;' but they would not be in order unless one sword were under the other, and also unless the lower could be lifted by the other. If the temporal power goes astray, then must it be rectified by the spiritual; if such a power ill-treats those who are under it, it has a judge in the higher spiritual power; but this which is the highest of all can be judged by God only, not by any man. Wherefore we do declare, proclaim, decree and determine hereby that every human creature is subject to the Roman Pope, and that none can be saved who doth not so believe."

It is unnecessary to refer to the pretensions of the present Pope, beside which even these arrogant assumptions of his predecessors dwindle into comparative insignificance. Mr. Gladstone's pamphlet, and Dr. Schatt's publication of the Vatican decrees, together with the recent attempt of the papacy to reduce them to practice by declaring a dissolution of the civil authority in some of the South American States, have made us sufficiently familiar with what Rome will dare to do when the opportunity serves.—Christian Intelligencer.

The "Bible-Reading" Preachers.

BY THEODORE L. CUYLER, D. D.

The visit of Mr. Henry Varley, of London, to America, suggests to us to say a few things about the remarkable cluster of men and women to which he belongs. We call them a cluster, for they have not yet taken shape sufficiently or have become sufficiently numerous to be styled a "class." They are too undenominational to bear any sectarian name. The foremost names in this cluster are Mr. D. L. Moody, of Chicago, Henry Varley Lord Radstock and Henry Morehouse, of England, R. Pearsall Smith and his wife, of Philadelphia, and Miss Smiley, whose earthly abiding-place is a little cottage nigh unto one of the springs of Saratoga.

None of them wear the title of "reverend," although they all proclaim the glorious gospel of the blessed God with great earnestness and popular power. Two of them (Messrs. Moody and Varley) have addressed larger audiences in England this year than any British preacher, except it be Spurgeon. They are all laymen (or women) who have felt an inward drawing to the delightful work of unfolding the Scriptures. Mr. Varley has gone somewhat further than the others. After quitting his trade as a meat dealer in the London markets, he has reared a tabernacle and gathered a permanent congregation at Notting Hill, in the West End of London. But he eschews the title, the costume and the habits of the regular clergy. He wishes to be regarded as simply a Christian man of business, who has consecrated his whole time and talents to the ministry of the word.

Pre-eminently this whole group are Bible expounders; their most interesting and attractive public services go by the name of "Bible readings." Three years ago Mr. Moody spent two months in conducting a series of Bible readings among my people, and the meetings were attended with daily conversions to Christ. Miss Sarah F. Smiley has held two delightful series of these Scripture lessons, mainly before the women-kind as auditors. She once preached Jesus to a great Sabbath audience from my pulpit; for is it not thus written in the Book of the Chronicles of the Presbytery of Brooklyn?

As my old friend Mr. Varley is just now conducting a short series of Bible readings in Lafayette Avenue church, let me jot down a brief sketch of his method, as a representative man of the group. He is a big, burly, broad-shouldered Englishman, with a ruddy face and a very rich voice. There is a downrightedness in the man, and a hugely sympathetic way with him that puts him at once into the good graces of his hearers. He has lively humor withal, and sometimes vents a pleasantry that sends a smile rippling over the assembly. Coming into the pulpit with a well-worn Bagster's Bible in his hand, he kneels down and engages in silent prayer. His public petitions are very fervent and familiar in their expressions. He talks reverently to God when he prays, and talks simply to the people when he preaches. Opening his flexible Bible (just such an one as every Sunday school teacher should have,) he reads a passage. Perhaps it is a few verses in the eighth chapter of Romans; perhaps a series of passages that bear upon the offices of the Holy Spirit. These verses he expounds and compares with other passages, thus explaining Scripture by Scripture. When he quotes a passage he generally names the chapter and verse, expecting the audience to turn to the passage in their own Bibles; for the preliminary notice always is: "Every one must be sure to bring their Bibles with them." These expositions are intermingled with brief incidents of personal experience and abound in illustrations. The Jewish ceremonials are much used as types and symbols. Some of their illustrations are very happy. Mr. Varley, in his pithy way, says: "Good friends, you make most of your crosses for yourselves. God does not send them. When you put your own will right across God's holy will, then you are sure to have a cross." Suiting the action to the word, he lays one pencil over another pencil or knife in the form of a †, and then says: "There, friends, there you have it." This sort of object teaching is suited to the humblest auditors.

The chief theme of Mr. Varley's most eloquent address is the "higher Christian life," or the life of complete trust in the crucified Savior. He teaches that perfect trust produces perfect peace. He does not preach "perfectionism;" but simply that every believer should exercise entire confidence in Jesus and aim to have "conscience void of offense toward God and man." There is not an entire agreement among the group of "Bible readers" upon their views of the "higher life." Mr. R. Pearsall Smith is a member of an "Old School" Presbyterian church in Philadelphia. Miss Smiley holds stanchly to the grand old doctrine of "assurance of hope," which was such a favorite doctrine of the Wesleys, Luther, Knox, and the rapturous Rutherford. I never heard Miss Smiley advance any views that went further than the volume "Christ Liveth in Me," published by the Presbyterian Publication Board in Philadelphia. Mr. Varley goes somewhat beyond her in his theories of Christian attainment. Mr. Moody is so occupied with arousing sinners to repentance, and in pulling souls out of the fire, that he seldom says much about the "higher life." He rings the seventh chapter of Romans into our ears, as well as the jubilant eighth chapter. All this cluster of Bible teachers agree in magnifying the cross of the Lord Jesus Christ, and in setting forth the blood of atonement as the only ground of human salvation.

This group also agree in interpreting the advent of Jesus Christ as a literal coming to earth and a personal reign at Jerusalem. Their views are those of the late Dean Alford and of the Bickersteths. A large portion of the Evangelicals in the English Church are "Literalists."

That this group of Bible-reading heralds of the gospel are producing mighty results is undeniable. They exalt God's word as the fount of all wisdom and truth. Multitudes are converted under their fervid discourses. Varley went through Canada, and Moody is going through Britain with the flaming power of Whitefield. These brethren are beginning to leaven the ministry of our time to a perceptible degree. The time is fast coming when elaborate written essays will give place to a simpler, warmer, mightier holding up of God's all-glorious word.—Independent.

LEPROSY IN THE EAST.—A Constantinople paper states that Dr. Vandyke Carter, an English physician, has been visiting the islands of the Turkish archipelago with the view of studying the nature and causes of leprosy. The malady of Neaman and Gehazi is still frequent in many parts of Asia Minor; and in Crete, as well as in several of the Sporades, villages exist in which every human being is a leper, where there is marrying and giving in marriage, and where the incurable evil is thus handed down from generation to generation. The Island of Crete, where Dr. Vandyke Carter is now reported to be carrying on his humane researches, will offer him, in spite of its genial and generally healthy climate, a vast field for observation. The lower classes of Cretans, it appears, are especially susceptible to leprosy, the spontaneous appearance of which is usually attributed to the immoderate consumption of oil and salt fish.

EDIBLE BIRDS' NESTS.—A report recently sent to the British Colonial Office from Labuan gives a curious account of the edible birds' nests, which are included among the "articles imported for the export trade to Singapore." These nests, we are told, are found on the walls of caverns in limestone and sandstone hills all along the coast, but by far the greater part of the supplies received at Labuan are brought from Sandakan Bay and the Kina Batangan river, on the east coast of Borneo. The devourers of these dainties, it seems, distinguish three qualities of them, known as white, red and black. They are produced by two kinds of small swallow; the black nests are by far the most common, and are of much inferior value, one especial drawback being that they are "much mixed with dirt and feathers." Of the finest quality are the white nests, which are without admixture of refuse matter, and of a semi-transparent white substance, resembling isinglass or gelatine. The red nests are of intermediate appearance between the white and black, and are supposed to be made by the bird which constructs the white nests, but at a different season of the year. There is a marked distinction in the price of these delicacies; the white nests sell for 45s. the "catty," the red for 20s., the black for 4s. 2d.

Another article of food esteemed by the Chinese as economical and nourishing is the trepang or dried sea-slug, which is collected in abundance among the reefs, islands and bays of the east coast of the Sooloo seas, and of Palawan.

Pearls are also largely dealt in at Labuan; the smaller kinds are exported to India and China for the purpose, it is said, of being used in medicine and burnt into lime for the Rajahs to chew with their betel and sirih leaf.

ONE OF THE SORROWS OF LIFE.—Many a volume has been written about the love of parents, the love of mothers, its enthusiasms of hope and fancy, its adorations of the unworthy, its agony for the lost; but I do not remember that any one has ventured to touch upon a still more terrible view of the subject: the disappointments, for example, with which such a woman as I have attempted to set before the reader—a woman full of high aspirations, noble generosities, and perhaps an unwarrantable personal pride, all intensified by the homely circumstances of life around her—sometimes looks upon the absolutely commonplace people whom she has brought into the world. She, too, has had her dreams about them while they were children, and all things seemed possible—while they were youth, with still some grace and freshness of the morning veiling their unheroic outlines. But a woman of seventy can cherish no fond delusions about her middle-aged sons and daughters, who are, to all intents and purposes, as old as she is. What a dismal sense of failure must come into such a woman's heart while she looks at them! Perhaps this is a reason why grandfathers and grandmothers throw themselves so eagerly into the new generations, by means of which human nature can always go on deceiving itself. Heavens! What a difference between the ordinary man or woman of fifty, and that ideal creature which he or she appeared to the mother's eyes at fifteen! The old people gaze and gaze to see our old features in us; and who can express the blank of that disappointment, the cruel mortifications of those old hopes, which never find expression in any words?—Mrs. Oliphant.

MONDAY FOR MINISTERS.—Every pastor asks himself on Monday morning: "What shall I do with myself to-day?" His mode of answering this question will decide his permanent usefulness and the length of his days. After the exhaustion of Sabbath work he must have rest; but many a minister supposes himself to be resting when he is engaged in hard work. Hundreds of pastors take Monday for the visitation of the sick. That is the poorest day of the week for such ministry. For a sympathetic man such work is overmastering. He comes back from his Monday rounds among the sick, bringing with him part of all their ailments, fragments of neuralgia, rheumatism, fever and consumption. Such a Monday depletes his nervous energy more than the preceding Sabbath. We had rather preach two sermons than spend a half hour in trying to lift a hypochondriac out of his fidgets. Besides this, the sick and troubled will get less advantage from a pastor on Monday than on any other day of the week. He is apt to come into the invalid's room fagged out, his face less cheery, and his spirit less exuberant than on other days. And so there are two invalids together, and, instead of the pastor being able to lift the sick man up, the latter pulls down the first on the top of him.

To the fields on Monday morning, O clergymen! or to the picture galleries, or a group of friends who have time to take you into their society. Let this article scatter the delusion of those ministers of the gospel who think that visitation of the sick is to a pastor physically recuperative.

DR. SCHLOSSER, of Holland, has found that his own countrymen are the largest consumers of coffee in the world, and next to them the Belgians. In England the annual consumption of coffee by each person is one and one-eighth pounds, in France two and one-half, in Germany four, in Denmark five and one-half, in Switzerland six, in the United States seven, in Belgium eight and one-half, in Holland ten and one-half. It is to be considered, however, that the English are notoriously a tea-drinking people, preferring it to coffee, not only for the evening meal, but for breakfast as well.

WRITING INK is one of the things in which modern science seems to have made very little improvement. A recent analysis of the ink found on a manuscript of the year 910 showed that its composition was similar to that of the inks now in general use.

Religious Intelligence.

IN THE old province of Prussia 16,700 Catholics have turned Protestant during the past year.

A ROMISH PRIEST was received into the English Church in London on Christmas day—the third case of priestly conversion recently recorded.

MR. GIBSON, in San Francisco, recently held his first Chinese love-feast. Thirty-five persons gave a relation of Christian experience, and thirty persons partook of the communion. There were fifty present—men and women.

A NEW Baptist chapel is to be opened in Rome during Easter week, at No. 35 Piazza San Lorenzo in Lucina, a small square leading off from the Corso. The chapel and school-room adjoining will accommodate three or four hundred hearers.

BISHOP VAUGHAN, of England, and seven priests, have arrived in this country, for a mission among the freedmen. Baltimore will be the base of operations. This movement of the Catholics is significant, and should arouse Protestants to increased activity.

THE Congregationalists in England have 3,276 churches, and 612 in Canada, Australia, etc. In this country the number of Congregational churches is 3,325, making a total of 7,213 churches in both countries. The contributions of the English Congregationalists for church purposes, not including gifts and collections for benevolent objects, amounted last year to over $4,000,000.

THE Universalists of the Northwest have arranged for a series of prayer meetings in Michigan, Indiana and Ohio, "for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon the churches, and for mutual help and encouragement in Christian life; and by the grace of God for the quickening of religious life among the people." This looks like a reaction against "free religion," and indicates an advance in the right direction.

FREE CHURCH OF ITALY.—The sixth General Assembly of this body was held at Turin recently, and lasted five days, having held nine sessions. Twenty-five churches were represented by thirty delegates. Signor Gavazzi took an active part in the proceedings. The treasurer announced that his funds had enabled him to purchase a magnificent building in Rome. Gavazzi made an eloquent appeal in behalf of the Free Church College in Rome, which, it seems, has been already opened for students.

THE Nashville Christian Advocate of February 13 has this among its editorial notes: "We are asked how far Pedobaptists exceed in numbers anti-Pedobaptists. According to the United States census for 1870 those whose preferences were for the latter numbered 4,360,135—nearly all besides, who have any religious preference, favor Pedobaptism; 5,528,209 prefer the Methodist Church. The disparity is much greater in Great Britain and Ireland. In other parts of the Christian world the people are nearly all Pedobaptists."

THE American Baptist Missionary Union has received $82,864 during the present financial year to the first of January, against $90,100 during the same months last year. Should the closing of the books on the first of April find the treasury with a heavy debt, as now seems imminent, the half dozen young men, who are under appointment to enter the foreign work during the coming year, will be compelled to remain at home. Last year's receipts also included thank-offerings amounting to more than $20,000, in addition to the usual receipts.

THE Freeman's Journal (Roman Catholic) renders the following verdict against our public schools: "One thing is certain. Archbishops and bishops may be multiplied, and priests ordained, and thousands of churches built; but if our bishops do not, following the vicar of Christ, forbid Catholics sending their children to godless schools, in fifty years from now the Catholic Church in the United States will be a shriveled and ghastly skeleton—a dry waste after a wave of European emigration—a scattered flock, but false shepherds fed and fattened on, and left unsheltered from the wolves."

THERE has been another manifestation of the love of Roman Catholics for Protestants in Mexico. On the evening of the twenty-sixth ultimo a mob attacked the Protestant church recently established in Acapulco by Rev. M. N. Hutchinson, superintendent of the Presbyterian mission. The mob was armed with machettes and rifles, and forced Mr. Hutchinson, whom they sought to kill, to take refuge on a United States vessel of war that was fortunately in the harbor. We are curious to see what the Romish papers will say of this pleasant little escapade, and shall read with interest their reasons palliating or excusing it.

THE Persian mission, under the care of the Presbyterian Board, has a working force of 7 missionaries and their wives, 1 physician, 3 unmarried ladies, 51 native preachers and pastors, and 95 helpers. The Syrian mission, under the same auspices, has a force of 13 ordained missionaries, 1 physician and 14 women. They occupy 3 stations on the Mediterranean sea, and 2 upon Mount Lebanon. The missionaries have the help of 82 native teachers and preachers. Last year 11,000,000 pages of printed matter were sent forth from the presses of the mission, of which nearly 4,000,000 were pages of the Bible. Nearly $10,000 was received from the sale of books.

ONE effect of the breach between the High and Low Church parties in Illinois, which has widened since Dr. DeKoven's election as Bishop, is the resignation of Rev. Arthur Brooks, of St. James' Episcopal church, Chicago. Being more of a Broad churchman than anything else, he proposes to withdraw from that field and leave the diocese to settle the present difficulty for itself. Among other Episcopal items are the organization of two new "Reformed" churches—one in Chicago, over which the Rev. Mr. Postlethwaite, recently of New York, is settled, and another in Germantown, which will be the third Reformed church established in and near Philadelphia.

A LETTER in the Pacific Christian Advocate tells of a precious revival in the Yakima Indian agency, of which Father Wilbur is in charge. It says: "January 3, 1875—I believe we had the best meeting at Joe Stwires' church to-day that I ever attended. There seemed to be more interest manifested than I have ever witnessed. Bro. Kuykendall seems to be a great worker. He has been holding meetings daily among the Indians for about eight or ten days. There have been a good many joined the church since Father Wilbur left." Joe Stwires is the head chief of the Yakima tribe, and is an exhorter in the church.

ON MONDAY, January 11, a most delightful union communion service was held in Brunswick Wesleyan chapel, Newcastle-on-Tyne. The Baptists and Churchmen, as well as Presbyterians and Methodists, participated in the service. Rev. Joseph Bush presided, and addresses were delivered by Rev. David Lowe, of the John Knox Presbyterian church, and Rev. G. H. Malins, of Marlboro Crescent Baptist church. Several other ministers assisted in the devotions and eucharistic service. A similar service was conducted at the same hour in two other chapels in different parts of the town. These united communion services were the indirect fruits of Messrs. Moody and Sankey's evangelistic labors in Newcastle.

EARLY CONVERSIONS.—The following statistics, taken at a Methodist preachers' meeting in New York, are thrilling in their testimony to the value of early conversion: Of 76 ministers present, 20 were converted under 14 years of age, 22 between 14 and 16 years of age, 14 between 18 and 21 years of age. Only 7 (less than one-tenth) when over 21 years of age. In the Central New York Conference this matter was under discussion, and in answer to the question of age at conversion it appeared that, of 250 ministers present, the youngest at conversion was only 7, the oldest 20, the average 15; not a single man of that great company of Christian laborers being above 20 when entering the Lord's fold.

THE French Wesleyan Methodists have in the city of Paris two churches, four school-rooms, one parsonage, one residence for the married schoolmaster and schoolmistress, one residence for a Scripture reader and visitor, one apartment for an unmarried schoolmistress, and one apartment for the church sexton. The debts against the Conference property aggregate £1,000. We find in the French Evangeliste an appeal from Conference President Rev. James Hocart for contributions to aid in liquidating this debt. Subscriptions amounting to about £100 had already been received in Paris, and it was hoped that English and American friends would forward contributions for the object. Even the smallest sums will prove acceptable, and we hope to chronicle ere long remittances sufficient to relieve the indebtedness.—New York Christian Advocate.

THE growth of the Roman Catholic Church in the last half century, in the New England States, has been remarkable. In 1825—just fifty years ago—when Bishop Fenwick arrived in Boston, there were one priest in Massachusetts, one in New Hampshire and one in Maine. Eight churches, of which one only was no more than a chapel. And this was the Catholic Church in all New England. Ten years later, in 1835, there were 27 priests, 22 churches and 40,000 Catholics. In 1814, when Connecticut and Rhode Island were made a new diocese, there were but 30 priests, 37 churches and 60,000 Roman Catholics in all New England. To-day in New England there are 1 archdiocese and 5—probably soon to be 6—dioceses. In the New England of to-day there are 1 archbishop, 5 bishops, 441 priests, 432 churches, and nearly 1,000,000 of members.

THE religious needs of the inhabitants of Alaska are reported as being as pressing as they are poorly supplied. The aborigines number about twenty thousand, and are mostly settled in villages along the shore. They are anxious to have the same advantages as those enjoyed by the natives in the British Territory, and, being expert in the building of log structures, are willing to build churches and school-houses. They have petitioned government for ministers and teachers. Alaska is a hopeful field for missionary work. The natives are not savages, but peaceful and docile people, among whom evangelical labor might be done with great hope of success. As there are about fifty ministers for every vacant position in this part of the country, we suggest to some of the brethren who are seeking fields of labor the idea of trying missionary work in Alaska for a few years.—Christian at Work.

A WONDERFUL CHURCH.—We read of a most wonderful and a most flourishing native church at a village called Nagercoil, close to Cape Comorin. We say a most wonderful church, simply because there is nothing like it throughout the length and breadth of this empire. It is quite independent of any foreign aid, supports its own pastors and catechists, a society similar to the Bible and Tract societies, and it subscribes to almost all charitable institutions. The congregation numbers about 2,000, of whom 250 are communicants. There are 185 men and 259 women able to read and write. Last year the native Christians gave Rs. 2,302 for mission purposes, one deacon alone giving Rs. 400. Besides the pastor, their church supports a catechist, 3 schoolmasters, 2 Bible women and 1 hospital assistant. Would we could say the same of other native churches in India! The time, however, will come.—Lucknow Witness.

CHANGE OF RATES.

In conformity with an agreement between the several papers published in the interest of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, the subscription price of the ADVOCATE, including postage, will hereafter be as follows, viz.:

One year	$2 50
Six months	1 50
Three months	80

THE SUBSCRIPTION PRICE of the ADVOCATE is One Dollar and a Quarter per year to ministers of the gospel, and the same to the widows of deceased itinerant preachers. Where bills have been sent charging them more than that amount it was owing to the fact that they were not known as such to the book-keeper, and if they will inform us the accounts will be corrected. Should they have already paid we will credit the amount overpaid on subscription, or dispose of it as they may order.

LOOK OUT FOR ACKNOWLEDGMENTS.—Subscribers and other persons writing to us should look in the letter list for the acknowledgment of their letters. The letters which reach us on or before Saturday of each week are acknowledged in the issue of the following Thursday.

RATES.

The New Orleans Christian Advocate will be furnished to subscribers hereafter at the following rates, including postage:

One Year	$2 50
Six Months	1 50
Three Months	80

$1.25 A YEAR

to all Ministers of the Gospel, traveling or local and widows of deceased traveling preachers.

to any person forwarding to us four new yearly subscribers, with TEN DOLLARS.

A Calamity.

At this writing the great scandal suit is still in progress, and we can hardly hazard a conjecture in reference to the verdict. For more than a month the trial has been under way, and it may have several months to ran before the case will be given to the jury. General Butler declared months ago that the conviction of Beecher would be "a national calamity." He spoke, of course, as a politician, and with reference to the fact that the eminent preacher had been prominent in the crusade of the abolitionists, and in supporting the war against the South. His earliest notoriety was gained by recommending a resort to arms in connection with the excitement over "bleeding Kansas." "Sharpe's rifles Beecher" was for a time the best-known title of this preacher of the gospel. Besides the great services rendered at home, he went to Europe during the war, and advocated the cause of the North on the platform of Exeter Hall and elsewhere.

No one man perhaps did more to shape and influence public opinion and to keep up the war spirit. In the minds of the Northern people he is a representative character, identified with the Radical party and its principles. The nation, as this party apprehend the matter, owes a debt of gratitude to the man whose eloquence and influence contributed so much to the success of the war and to the preservation of the Union. The fall of Beecher may throw some backward shadows upon the fanaticism with which he was so deeply imbued, and it may at this critical time weaken the hold of the party "of great moral ideas" upon the people. The Brooklyn pastor's services in the recent national struggle have been alluded to in the trial, and we may be sure that they will be made still more prominent before the defense has done. For the credit of abolitionism, and for the fair fame of the party, his character must be cleared of the foul charge with which Tilton is seeking to asperse it.

Then there is the interest of religion to be guarded. Mr. Evarts has taken pains to declare that "the Christian religion is not on trial," but still there are those who feel that the phase of the Christian religion which Mr. Beecher presents is somewhat involved. His peculiar way of putting religious truth, his exuberant sentimentality, his vacillating and changeful adherence to any form of sound words, and his coatempt for doctrinal standards generally, and the rather sensuous and voluptuous tone of his teachings, are inevitably associated with the revelations of this celebrated trial. The Christian religion is not on trial in this case. Popular ignorance and unbelief may to some extent so regard it, but if any religion is on trial it is simply the religion of Plymouth church, of its pastor, and of that Beecherizing school which has spread from this center and hot-bed of erratic and liberal theology.

Should Mr. Beecher be adjudged guilty, and should this be the popular verdict without much regard to the findings of the jury, the Christian religion will not go down with him, however much it may affect the value of stock in Plymouth church; not even if it should, as Mr. Wilkes, one of Beecher's publishers, declares, knock the Life of Christ higher than a kite, will the gospel perish. If the preacher is guilty, that guilt may reflect unfavorably upon both his political and religious antecedents, but the nation and Christianity may survive the ordeal.

The greatest calamity connected with the whole affair is the effect which the details of the trial are likely to have on the morals of the country. The press has given the evidence in full, and it has been read with avidity. All classes are familiar with the circumstances, and the public mind is saturated with the disgusting story. It has entered nearly every household, and it is the subject of discussion in circles from which such topics are usually excluded. The very children are asking what it is all about. Obscene literature is doubtless doing fearful damage to the morals of the people; especially is it poisoning the minds of the youth, and bringing the blight of hell upon society. But the tendency of this great scandal, with its wide publicity and the eminence of those involved, is in the same direction. Take the parties to this trial, the array of legal ability and the character of many of the witnesses, and the world has seldom seen a group of more imposing magnitude. Can the revelations and exposures of this gigantic conflict go out to the world without inflicting most serious damage upon society? We fear that the uncovering of this scene of infamy will scatter the seeds of impurity and licentiousness broadcast, and far and wide, and that a direful harvest will rapidly spring up.

It is this aspect of the great scandal which exhibits the most terrible calamity connected with it. It is reaching where bad literature does not go, and it is revealing crime such as thousands would never have thought of, and familiarizing their minds with scenes of impurity which cannot but contaminate the soul and defile the unwary. There are about this case so many fascinating accessories of fame, talent, wealth, friendships, rivalries, intrigues, half confessions, penitence, despair, desperation, and we know not what, that the whole affair, with a little filling in, would read like a romance, and a very bad romance at that.

As yet the whole case has not been presented, and we may not now express an opinion on the question of guilt. However this may be determined, the mischief of debauching and corrupting the morals of the country is already done. Ten thousand pities that the whole matter could not have been quietly disposed of in some way, without regard to the politics, theology, and the value of certain stock interests which were supposed to be at stake. Whatever the true character of these parties may be, Tilton, Beecher, Bowen, Moulton and Woodhull have succeeded in manufacturing a sensation which will leave its filthy and slimy track upon the morals of the nation for at least a generation to come.

The Sword of the Spirit.

One of the most encouraging signs of religious prosperity is the increased interest in the study of the word of God. The noted revivalists, such as Moody and Hammond, are expounders of the Scriptures. Dr. Hall, in his Yale lectures, insists upon expository preaching as the most profitable and effective. A topical essay, with a mere catch-word from the Scriptures to give it something of authority and weight, is scarcely worthy the name of preaching. Reflections of a philosophical nature; history, science and metaphysics, connected by way of suggestion with some inspired declaration; or lectures on morals, with but little reference to the gospel as the power of God, are very meager diet for souls that hunger for the bread of life.

The sword of the Spirit is the word of God. To wield this weapon is the business of the Christian soldier, and if wielded with intelligence and with faith the strongholds of the mighty will be taken: "For the word of God is quick and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart." The properties of the word are indeed wonderful as set forth in such terms as these. The Savior prays that the disciples might be sanctified through the truth. It would seem to be of the highest moment, from the character of the Scriptures as the means of awakening and purifying, that they should be most fully exhibited in preaching.

There is a reaction of the popular taste in regard to this subject, which we hope will continue until the exposition of Scripture becomes the universal practice. It does seem very much like trifling with the word of God to select from it merely a motto for the heading of a discourse, while the great storehouse of spiritual riches is left unopened and unexplored. If the sword of the Spirit is the word of God, it is this that we should have in hand. Without this the weapons of our warfare are carnal, and we have no right to expect that God will honor them in the largest results. The Spirit will attend the word of God, while he may be grieved and affronted by the greater eminence given to our own word, and the parade of human forms of thought and eloquence.

Augustine.

This eminent father, writer and theologian, and Bishop of Hippo, in northern Africa, was born at Tagaste, in Numidia, at that time a part of the Roman empire. His mother, Monica, was a Christian of most saintly piety. Augustine is another example of the blessed power of a holy mother. She took care that her son should be instructed in the elements of Christian doctrine and morals. His father, who cared more for worldly than Christian knowledge, secured for the son the best educational advantages. He studied first at Madaura, and afterward at Carthage. At this latter place Augustine unfortunately imbibed the errors of the Manichean heresy, so called from Mani or Manes, a Persian, born about A. D. 214, who held to a duality, or two eternal and antagonistic principles of good and evil. This heresy extended over much of the Oriental world, penetrated northern Africa, and found many adherents even in Europe. Augustine also fell into immoral habits. He left Carthage against the wish of his mother, and settled in Rome. After some while he removed to Milan. At this time the celebrated and holy Ambrose was the Bishop. Under his ministry Augustine was convinced of his errors, and awakened to a sense of spiritual needs. While in his garden, bowed in prayer, he says he heard a voice speaking, from whence he knew not: "Tolle lege"—"Take and read." He asked his friend Alype for a book, and he gave him Paul's Epistles. A sentence or two only sufficed to pour light into his mind, and to illuminate his path to Christ. He sent for his mother. She came and rejoiced with great joy over his return from his errors and his sins. He remained in the class of the catechumens, or candidates being instructed and prepared for membership in the church, and was then baptized by Ambrose, the Bishop. Soon after this he returned to his native place—Tagaste—where he spent three years in study and devotion. After this, about A. D. 391, he went to Hippo, and was soon after made Bishop of that place.

Augustine was a diligent student and voluminous writer. His collected writings amount to ten volumes folio. None of the ancient fathers have exerted such a widespread and permanent influence upon the theology of the church as Augustine. He was the father of that theory of the moral government of God known and designated in modern times as the Calvinistic, after Calvin, the most distinguished advocate and expounder of Augustine's views. Augustine's theological views are comprised in the following summary:

"1. Infant Baptism.—The baptism of infants as well as adults is for the forgiveness of sin. Children have, indeed, committed no actual sins, yet by original sin they are under the power of the devil, from which they are freed by baptism. Hence Christian children who die before baptism no more escape positive punishment in the future life than do all who are not Christians.

"2. Original Sin.—By Adam's sin, in whom all men jointly together sin, and the other positive punishments of Adam, sin came into the world. By it human nature has been both physically and morally corrupted. Every man brings into the world with him a nature already so corrupt that he can do nothing but sin. The propagation of this quality of his nature is by concupiscence.

"3. Free Will.—By Adam's transgression the freedom of the human will has been entirely lost. In his present corrupt state man can will and do only evil.

"4. Grace.—If, nevertheless, man in his present state wills and does good, it is merely the work of grace. It is an inward, secret and wonderful operation of God upon man. It is a preceding as well as an accompanying work. By preceding grace man attains faith, by which he comes into an insight of good, and by which power is given him to will the good. He needs co-operating grace for the performance of every individual good act. As man can do nothing without grace, so he can do nothing against it. It is irresistible. And as man by nature has no merit at all, no respect at all can be had to man's moral disposition in imparting grace; but God acts according to his own free will.

"5. Predestination and Redemption.—From eternity God made a free and unconditional decree to save a few from the mass that was corrupted and subjected to damnation. To those whom he predestined to this salvation he gives the requisite means for the purpose. But on the rest, who do not belong to this small number of the elect, the merited ruin falls. Christ came into the world and died for the elect only."

It will be seen by this summary of Augustine's theology that it was what is now called Calvinistic. He was a famous controvertist, and in his controversy with the Donatist exhibited great bitterness. Augustine, from the command of the householder, "Compel them to come in," deduced the doctrine of the right to persecute for opinion's sake—a doctrine which ecclesiastics and statesmen have most cruelly and remorselessly carried out. Augustine was born A. D. 354, and died at Hippo, A. D. 430, aged seventy-six years. He was a great, and, we hope, a good man; but, as we understand the matter, his opinions have been dangerous and damaging. W.

The World for Christ.

BY BISHOP MARVIN.

I have been gratified to see so much space in our church papers of late given to the cause of missions. The situation is such as to cause actual alarm, and justify all the earnestness manifested by the secretaries and the board. The board has taken the precautions, indeed, against actual insolvency, but these precautions are of a nature that, if the necessity continues, must cast a blight upon our mission-fields, and by the reaction damage the spirit of the church at home. Even the missions already established must be abandoned or reduced to a mere cipher, unless our revenues can be augmented.

I fear there is widespread misapprehension of the facts as to the demands of our work. One of our most intelligent members, one who takes a real interest in missions, expressed great surprise to me the other day that our treasury should be at so low an ebb. Upon some conversation I found that my friend had some information as to the amount of money received by the board in the last year, and also understood about the extent of our operations in China and Mexico and among the Indians. The amount of money contributed seemed ample for the amount of work done. Indeed so it would be if these were our only fields. But in this case a large part of the field was overlooked. It was not understood that all the German work, and all the new territory in the illimitable West had to be supplied from the resources of the foreign board. The word foreign suggests that the work in charge of the board at Nashville is wholly among the heathen. Not so. It embraces all the new country where, if the church is established at all, it must be by missionary labor.

Take a map of the United States; look at that sweep of country that lies west of the State of Missouri; it is all new, and much of it very thinly inhabited. Most of the inhabitants are emigrants recently gone to a new country; they have not had time to accumulate property; they cannot support preachers, especially as the church is, as in all new countries, unorganized; so that the little wealth there is is difficult to reach for church purposes. The gospel must be sent to them from more favored regions, where the church is already organized and opulent. The board has never had one fourth part the amount of money needed to supply men for this field alone. If all foreign work had been abandoned.

The deliberations of the board at its annual sessions, ever since the war, have been, for the most part, painful discussions of two questions: First, which of these fields before us, white to the harvest, shall be totally neglected; and, secondly, how little can those we determine to enter or maintain ourselves in do upon? How nearly can we approximate nothing and yet keep the field? Instead of generous questions of enlargement, looking to the conquest of the world for Christ, we have had to look each other in the face and say: Which of these Macedonian calls shall we refuse, and how little must we do where we attempt any response? Sometimes I can but wish that every intelligent member of the church might be on the board of missions and get the near view of the crying needs of the work which would be brought to his eyes if he were in that relation to it.

There is only here and there a member of the church apparently alive to this subject. Here and there a poor woman devotes the chickens of one hen to God and his cause. God will greatly honor this painstaking love of his poor, and if there were only one-tenth part of all the poor of the church in this spirit it would swell the revenues of the board so as to set forward the work and cause angels to rejoice. But, alas! how few there are.

Indeed, so far is the membership of the church from being alive to the demands of the cause that it may well be considered doubtful if one in twenty of the preachers is so. Many of them certainly are wanting in any earnest sense of obligation.

It seems impossible that a man who has himself been saved from hell and sin, and who has heard the voice of his Redeemer saying to him, "Go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature," should be indifferent to the missionary efforts of his church. Is it not cause of alarm as to the salvation of a man himself when he comes short of his highest effort to contribute to the salvation of others?

Enthusiasm for the conquest of the world by Christ is a mark of the genuine spirit of religion. How can a man who loves and adores Christ be unconcerned that, after the lapse of so many ages, a large part of the world is alien to him? Especially must the minister of Christ be an enthusiast for him. If an insipid indifference to the triumph of the gospel comes to mark the spirit of the very men called to preach the gospel, death is already at the heart of the church.

Can it be that there are pastors among us who are content to go through the official round of duties in a perfunctory way and get their own pay, and then go to Conference without a blush, reporting a mere trifle for missions? At the bar of God they will blush. One-half the preachers on fire with the spirit of devotion to Christ would bring about a glorious revolution in the church.

Let us wake out of sleep. The Son of God must conquer the earth. He will; but if we, as a grand division of the army of conquest, fall or fall back and become demoralized, we may check the onward movement; and, though we cannot bring final defeat, another will take our crown.

Enthusiasm for Christ! That is the crying need of the church—of our church to-day—the spirit of Wesley, the spirit of Paul, the spirit of the Master!

The world for Christ! May this become our watchword. The world for Christ! Shame upon every laggard in the host! Do something! Go—or if you cannot go, give. Go or send.—Nashville Christian Advocate.

Religious State of Spain.

It must be admitted that indifference is the prevailing sentiment in regard to religion. We have conversed with landed proprietors in country districts, and with professional men in the towns; and almost all say: "With respect to my opinions, I am a Protestant, I am a free-thinker, I am a materialist." This would seem to imply that they have an opinion, but the words must be interpreted thus, "I am indifferent," for they are ignorant of the meaning of these several names. In spite of the efforts of the evangelical church of Spain, Spaniards are not very easily converted into Protestants; and as for materialistic doctrines, they are connected with the most difficult scientific controversies. The expressions, "I am a Protestant, I am a materialist," therefore, meant in the mouths of our friends disaffection toward the Catholic Church.

The clergy in Spain are now paying the penalty for having so long neglected the instruction of their flocks. The people whom they had ruled with despotic power, and who had regarded them as flesh of their flesh, now curse and forsake them. The position of the monks and priests is very painful. The indemnities that were to have been given them for the confiscation of their property have not been paid. Many of them have been compelled to give up their ecclesiastical calling and take to manual labor. But what is even more painful to the enlightened men in the church in Spain than these passing tribulations is to see the nation as a whole forsaking the faith of its forefathers, without possessing any philosophical and religious ideal that might be substituted for it. There will thus be for a longer or shorter period something wanting in the national life of Spain, for there can be no fruitful national life without a definite ideal.

Meanwhile nothing can be sadder at the present moment than the religious confusion (desarroi) of this people. One day we saw the viaticum (the consecrated wafer which is administered to the dying) being carried along the street of a village, when a troop of pigs rushed at the procession. The incident provoked general laughter. Another time we observed that on a similar occasion the people did not doff their hats. Streets are being rebaptized, because they bear the name of some saint. The fronts of buildings are being mutilated because they represent some religious subject; pictures are being taken away from the churches and placed in the museums; ridiculous photographs represent the fallen Queen and her clerical surroundings. In the midst of these hostilities puerile acts of devotion worthy of the middle ages are still performed under a pretext of faith; but no creed has as yet been brought forward in opposition to the Catholic creed, nor has any effort been made to liberalize the teaching of the church in accordance with the views of modern times. It is a war without ideas, a quarrel in the midst of a void. But we must say that the systematic way in which this people have been allowed to grow up in ignorance is sufficient to account for this void, and no one will be astonished at this when we mention that seven-tenths of the adult population cannot read, and that in the interior of the country there are towns of twenty thousand inhabitants without a single book shop.

Shall we despair of this people? We think not, because they have remained idealistic and noble, and because the apparent want of religion now prevailing is the result of the confusion common to periods of religious transition, when men shake off the leading-strings of childhood. We have heard many enlightened Spaniards say with an accent of conviction: "The moral and religious reformation of our country will be the result of this chaos of doubt and rebellion. The rising tide of a simpler and more enlightened faith will flow over the land. We shall remain, or rather we shall become, Christians." Senor Castelar's words in reference to this subject met with general approval. "I turn away my eyes," said he in his place in Parliament, "from what is of human invention in our religion, and fix them on him who has given himself to us as an example. My eyes behold the Master, and from him I look for the grace which I need in order to follow him." This profession of philosophical and moral faith was greatly applauded. Resurgam! (I shall rise again) is in Spain, as elsewhere, the motto fondly cherished by many. Religion purged and better understood, and education more general, will one day bring about the realization of this hope. A great country, where ideal notions are clung to, where the women are honorable and generous, and the men are noble and ardent, where the soil is fertile, and the people intelligent, will sooner or later resume the position it merits among the nations. Revue Politique Litteraire.

The Baltimore Conference.

The editor of the Episcopal Methodist writes as follows of this Conference, which met in Washington city, March 3:

The Conference has been in session since Wednesday morning, the third instant. There is quite a full attendance of ministers and lay delegates, and the reports of the preachers in charge are highly encouraging. On several of the districts as many as five hundred conversions are reported, and the increase in the membership will be fully up to the average of former years; probably a larger addition than that of the year just closed, which was about two thousand, showing a membership of not less than twenty-six thousand in the Conference. Owing to the extraordinary stringency in the country the results of the year financially are not so favorable in regard to missions and the educational interests of the church.

The collections for the superannuated preachers and the widows and orphans of those who have died in the work are very cheering. It was announced to the Conference that the deficiency in this fund was some $1,200, when the whole amount was promptly contributed, thus enabling the joint board of finance to pay the claimants one hundred cents on the dollar! This is a most gratifying result. Thanks to our lay brethren, Messrs. Milnes, Parker, Magruder, Shipley, Leitz, Hough, Jesse B. Wilson, Peyton Conway and others. Never was an offering to the Lord's cause made with a more hearty good will. This is matter of profound gratification, and this example of liberality in behalf of our veteran friends who have so nobly borne the heat and burden of the day will not hereafter be forgotten. They may well be compared to the camel, driven by the Arabian, laden with precious treasures and browsing on the desert. No class of men are more deserving of attention than our worn-out preachers.

The two Conferences holding their annual sessions at the same time present a striking illustration of practical and cordial fraternity. In Winchester the Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church is mainly entertained by our own people, and in Washington the brethren of our Conference are warmly welcomed to the homes and hearts of both Methodisms.

All the pulpits of the Methodist churches, and a number of other churches in the metropolis, were occupied by the members of the Conference on Sunday. Bishop Marvin preached at Mount Vernon Place, and ordained the elders in the morning and the deacons at night.

An interesting feature of the day was the transfer of the Israel Methodist Episcopal Church (colored) in a body to the Methodist Episcopal Church South, on Sunday afternoon. Dr. A. W. Wilson officiated, assisted by Bishop Marvin. Bishop Miles, of the African Methodist Episcopal Church in America, was also present, having preached to the congregation in the morning. Altogether it was an occasion of unusual interest.

New Orleans District Conference.

The New Orleans District Conference will meet at the Carondelet Street church, New Orleans, on Thursday, April 8, at five o'clock P. M. On Friday night, at half-past seven o'clock, there will be a district love-feast at the Carondelet Street church, to which all the Methodists of the district are earnestly invited. On Sunday afternoon, April 11, at three o'clock, the regular anniversary of the district Sunday schools will be held. Bishop Paine will be present and preside at the District Conference. J. B. WALKER, P. E.

REV. A. ALBRIGHT, a member of our German Conference, and professor of the German language at the Texas University, Georgetown, died on the second instant. His end was peace. When asked, a short while before his death, by Dr. Mood, whether now, in the valley and shadow of death, the Lord was still with him, he opened his eyes once more, motioned upward, and said: "All is bright. Love to all."

HEREAFTER Rev. S. S. Roszell, D. D., will be associated with Dr. Poisal in the editorial management of the Baltimore Episcopal Methodist.

Mexico and the Romish "Orders."

Some of the women of Mexico seem to have a real affection for the chains which the Church of Rome has forged for the spiritual and moral debasement of their sex. They consider the "single blessedness" of conventual life a right and a privilege; and for its perpetuation they are ready to sacrifice even their fathers, brothers and husbands. At least such is the case with certain women of Guanajuato, if we take them at their word, as we find it embodied in a protest which they are said to have made against the law to abolish convents, recently passed by the Mexican Congress.

It is true that the protest of these Mexican women was leveled more especially against the portion of the act above named which is alleged to have expelled the Sisters of Charity from Mexico. And if this had been the exclusive intention or the real effect of the act it would indeed have deserved to be protested against as not only intolerant, but unjust and barbarous—that is, assuming that the functions of the Sisters of Charity in Mexico are the same as those of the sisterhood of that name in the United States and Europe. Few could be found who would be willing to defend the exile of a body of harmless females, whose whole time is devoted to acts of mercy and tenderness, and who habitually imperil their lives in ministering to the sick, irrespective of age or sex or creed. An act exiling such a class of devotees would be brutal and thoroughly indefensible.

If, then, it had been for an indignity and wrong done to such a class that the women of Guanajuato had declared that they would refuse "to recognize as father, brother or husband any body who directly took part in the action of the Mexican Congress," the penalty, though an extreme and a suicidal one, would perhaps have been defensible. But these good ladies have evidently been hasty, and have cast off their incumbrances in the form of "fathers, brothers and husbands" on insufficient grounds. In the first place, we do not understand that the Mexican Congress have passed an act exiling the Sisters of Charity, but one for their suppression as a corporate "order" of the Roman Catholic Church. It was a question of a civil and political nature, forming a part of a series of legislation by which the Mexican republic sought to unloosen the chain of ecclesiastical exactions and impositions which the Roman Catholic clergy had riveted upon the necks of the people of Mexico for generations. And it was intended to bring about the disintegration of the intolerable system which made these abuses not only possible, but inevitable. As we have read the account of these transactions, none of the regular clergy of the Roman Catholic Church have been interfered with, nor have their ministrations been prevented. It is only the monks and nuns, who had become social pests, who have been suppressed, together with their scandalous monasteries, nunneries and convents. Pastors have been left undisturbed, but all the "orders" of every grade, which had corrupted the public morals and made a stable government in Mexico an impossibility, because they were perpetually arrayed against the civil authority, have been abolished in their capacity of corporate bodies. These were nurseries of treason and disorder and profligacy which the government was obliged to suppress or be itself suppressed. Naturally it chose to do the former rather than suffer the latter.

Besides, the Sisters of Charity of Mexico, as we learn from entirely credible sources, were entirely unlike the Sisters of Charity in the United States. A correspondent of the Cleveland Leader describes them as swarming over the country by thousands, living in convents which usurped the most beautiful sites in the land, and waxing fat on the wines of Italy and Spain, and the delicious fruits of the Terra Caliente. Many of them were prolific, and under the direction of the monks they were constantly engaged in attempts to incite the ignorant and lower orders of the people to revolution, and to engage in intrigues against the government. If this be true, the sympathy that has been expressed for them would seem to have been, to say the least, excessive.

Since writing the above a telegraphic dispatch from the city of Mexico states that a number of the ladies referred to at the outset of this article have published cards, declaring that their signatures to the violent and unnatural protest over their names were obtained under false pretenses; while others deny that they signed the paper and pronounce their signatures forgeries. Evidently the whole affair is another Roman Catholic trick.—Christian Intelligencer.

CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.—Rev. Mr. Christopher once called on an aged class-leader, and, after having prayed with the family, said:

"Brother, how is it that you have been a church member so long and yet are not converted?"

"Are you my judge?"

"I know you by your fruits. You have no family worship."

"Do you know that I have no family worship?"

"Yes, I know it."

"Well, it is true; but I would like to know who told you."

"No one told me; but I know that, had you been in the habit of having family worship, that cat would not have jumped, frightened, out of the window as it did when we knelt to pray."

The test was true in that case. The brother confessed that he had omitted family worship because he did not wish to hinder his workmen. He was touched with the reproof, and immediately set up a family altar, and years afterward testified that he found it profitable, even financially, to acknowledge God in the house. Since he had made his religion real in his daily life his workmen had been more industrious and faithful.

So we come back to the truth of the old statement that "prayer and provender hinder no man's journey."

The Upper Shelf.

It is the place where so many really good things get pushed away and hidden from view. The mental upper shelf is a compartment of the memory supposed to be a great convenience, but which is, in fact, only a great mischief to the possessor. Looking there you may tumble over strange things which you had forgotten were in existence, while you exclaim: "Well, well! I remember now!" In this case it is emphatically true, as the old proverb says: "Out of sight is out of mind."

Here are whole sermons tossed away as rubbish, overlaid with dust, and consigned to the "serene slumbers of a doubtful immortality." You put them away carefully—so carefully that you never found them again, as many a housewife does with other valuable things. And here are choice scraps from your readings—pregnant pages that you knew were teeming with half-revealed truths, which you piously promised yourself to study out and build into your life and character before many days. The last sweet words of some dying saint, the strong, brave words of some courageous champion of the right, the simple words of faith from the lips of a child, the memory of an eloquent scene—all lie here, unturned to the light, waiting for the promised notice. Every day the newer ones thrown in are pushing them nearer to the wall, further out of sight.

The present is the best time to gather all the sweetness and profit from that which comes to us in this life. The days are too crowded with new thought, and filled too full of demands for earnest work, for one to depend upon leisure hours or favorable opportunities to consider these things. To make the thought available it should be seized and used at once. If there be anything in the sermon you heard last Sabbath to raise your mind and heart into a better spiritual air, see that it performs its mission to you before it is crowded from the memory by other and viler thoughts. "Now" is the name of the little island which lies midway between the eternity to come and the backward reach of years long gone. It alone is yours.

Now and then the thought of what lies hidden away some place flashes over your mind so vividly that by an unconscious intuition you are drawn to the very upper shelf, where your hand falls upon the precious relics remorsefully. "Alas, that I should have forgotten!" And this is all that can be done, save a tearful looking over of them, for their sweet odor is already spent, like the dead May flower in the mown grass.

Think of the good things you read at the time, and strengthen your resolves thereby. Prayerfully go from God's house, with the word of his servant in your ear, and do not toss it aside for vain thoughts, for it will be lost forever. Be present to yourselves; make the most of all good inspirations of word or pen now; and beware of the upper shelf!—Methodist Recorder.

REV. BENJAMIN JOHNSON.—This cultivated Christian gentleman and devoted minister of Christ, says the Southern Christian Advocate, after a most successful pastorate of about six years in this city, dissolved his connection with Christ church (Episcopal,) and with the Protestant Episcopal Church, with a farewell sermon on Sunday, the twenty-eighth of February. Mr. Johnson, by his genial manners, fervent piety and readiness to every good work had greatly endeared himself to the entire community of Macon, as well as to his immediate congregation, and his departure, which is universally regarded as a serious loss, is deeply regretted. Impelled by conscientious convictions to renounce his connection with the church in which he was reared, and at whose altars he has served most efficiently for twenty-five years, Mr. Johnson has gone to Baltimore to take charge of a congregation of the Reformed Episcopal Church, and is followed to his new field by the fervent prayers of a vast number of Christian friends whom he leaves in Macon.

THE Emperor of China, it is now stated, died of smallpox. The disease declared itself December 9, the day of the transit of Venus, and shortly afterward was reported as having assumed a severe type. The Peking Gazette of the fourteenth ultimo contained the first public intimation of his majesty's illness, in the shape of a decree appointing the seventh prince, the youngest of his majesty's three uncles, to offer the winter solstice sacrifices at the temple of heaven. On the twenty-third of December a great festival was to be held in honor of the Goddess of Smallpox. On the eighteenth of December an imperial decree was issued announcing the temporary resumption of government by the Empress Dowager.

A GOOD SUNDAY SCHOOL.—At a recent meeting of the St. Louis Sabbath School Teachers' Association, as reported in the St. Louis Daily Globe, the veteran Stephen Paxon named the following essentials of a good Sunday school:

1. A good place to hold the school.
2. Good Christian teachers.
3. A good superintendent.
4. A deep interest in the school on the part of parents.
5. A good weekly teachers' meeting, after which a prayer meeting for teachers and scholars.
6. A good supply of good Sunday school literature—not trash.
7. Punctuality on the part of superintendent, teachers and scholars.

Plenty of grace, grit and greenbacks, and then the blessing of God will follow.

Early Conversions.

The old-time hesitancy in receiving children into the church is fast passing away in the light of careful study and observation. Childish piety develops well under the fostering care of a healthy church. A large part of a pastor's work is in caring for these tender plants. They are neglected at the peril of all that is precious in the growth of the church. The strong men and women to-day, laboring in positions of large Christian influence, began their experience in youthful days. Few are converted in middle life. The following statistics, taken at a Methodist ministers' meeting in New York, are thrilling in their testimony to the value of early conversion: Of 76 ministers present, 20 were converted under 14 years of age, 22 between 14 and 16 years of ago, 14 between 18 and 21 years of age. Only 7 (less than one-tenth) when over 21 years of age.

What grander argument for earnest toil and large faith in Sunday schools, and everywhere among the young! In the Central New York Conference this matter was under discussion, and in answer to the question of age at conversion it appeared that, of 250 ministers present, the youngest at conversion was only 7, the oldest 20, the average 15; not a single man of that great company of Christian laborers being above 20 when entering the Lord's fold.

Early conviction and early conversion are the hope and joy of the faithful church.—Rev. Samuel H. Virgin, in Congregationalist.

MR. MOODY ON INQUIRY MEETINGS.—The address was on inquiry meetings. Mr. Moody said that some one had told him he liked everything but the "inquiry room." He wanted to show them that "inquiry meetings" were perfectly scriptural. He then read several passages, beginning with the case of the Baptist, and those who came to him, asking: "What shall we do, therefore?" the disciples who came to Jesus asking questions; the young man with the query: "What good thing shall I do?" etc. In all these he showed that the preaching of the truth had awakened the inquiry. He said he had but little faith in the preaching that did not make them inquire. In each case, he said, good advice was given; and that was what they did in the inquiry room. Ministers and experienced Christians conversed with anxious ones, and gave them good advice; and they who have been to Christ themselves were able to direct others. A thirsty traveler came to a fountain erected by the wayside, but he could not obtain the water, for he could not find the secret which caused the water to flow. He put down the cup, and was about to turn away when a little boy ran up, and, with his dirty thumb, touched the spring and the water streamed. That was what we did in the inquirers' room; we touched the spring, and showed the thirsty ones how to drink.—Mr. Moody in London.

PHOTOGRAPHS.—The establishment of Eugene Simon, successor to A. Constant, photographic artist, 21 Hospital street, near Old Levee, is one well worthy the attention of those wishing photographs. We are convinced that the establishment will lose none of its well-earned reputation under the management of Mr. Simon. See advertisement.

STAPLE AND FANCY DRY GOODS. See the advertisement of Auguste Marx, Esq., 383 Dryades street, who offers goods at auction prices. Mr. Marx has the reputation of buying to great advantage. Do not fail to interview him in reference to prices, if convenient, before buying. Consult his advertisement in another column to see what he offers.

DRUGS AND MEDICINES.—The valuable stock of drugs, medicines, perfumeries and fancy articles in the establishment of Dr. J. DeBenneville, on the corner of Camp and Poydras streets, with lease of store, has been bought out by our enterprising neighbor, W. H. Shearer, who is adding a large stock of fresh drugs and goods. See advertisement.

COTTON AND CORN PLANTER.—In another column will be found an advertisement of Harbin's Combined Cotton and Corn Planter, which planters will do well to examine, when, we think, they will be impressed with its practical value. The planter can be seen at A. Baldwin & Co.'s, on Canal street.

WE WOULD call attention to the advertisement of A. H. Griswold & Co. These gentlemen have long been well known throughout this Southern country as leaders in the watch and jewelry trade, and we can assure our friends who may deal with them that they can be relied on.

WE CALL ATTENTION to the card of Dr. Leffingwell, M. D. His Medical and Surgical Institute and Dispensary is located at No. 230 Canal street, where he engages to treat sore throats, catarrh and all chronic diseases.

EMBROIDERY AND LACE STORE.—A. D. Causse, at 538 Magazine street, near Felicity, advertises a fine stock of embroidery, lace, hosiery, gloves, corsets and trimmings. Call and examine the stock.

IN TO-DAY'S PAPER will be seen the attractive advertisement of Mr. A. M. Hill. Mr. Hill is agent for the celebrated Waltham watches, and has on hand a fine stock of jewelry.

NOTICE TO PLANTERS.

COMBINED

COTTON AND CORN PLANTER.

HARBIN'S COMBINED COTTON AND CORN PLANTER,

patented May 26, 1874, and now for the first time offered for sale in this city, is manufactured at Brady's Factory, corner St. Joseph and Fulton streets.

Parties desirous of examining this important adjunct to the planting interest will find it offered for sale at BRADY'S FACTORY, at A. BALDWIN & CO.'S large hardware house on Canal street, and by other prominent hardware firms in New Orleans.

This being the only Cotton Planter known that will separate the seed in planting, at the same time dropping, covering, harrowing and rolling the furrow, and with one horse and man saving the labor of five men and horses, it is with confidence that this great labor-saving invention is offered to the public.

The Corn attachment performs the same labor, dropping from one to eight seeds, as desired. mhi8 1m

NOTICE—NOTICE.

JACK FROST.

BY GEORGE COOPER.

I leave on the fields, by night,
The print of my feet, in white;
I scatter the snow like chaff;
I whistle and sing and laugh;
I hang at the sash,
The shutters I rattle;
O'er chimneys I dash,
I frighten the cattle;
I breathe, and the boughs are tossed;
Why, every one knows Jack Frost.

My arms, they are long and stout,
And doors may n't keep me out;
Far off to the ships I pass—
One touch, and their ropes are glass;
Each poor lonely tree
I prank up in lace;
My handiwork see
In all sorts of places;
And travelers, nipped and lost,
They shudder to hear Jack Frost.

Though boisterous I may seem,
Yet often I sweetly dream,
And visions of spring delight
I hide in my heart by night.
An icicle then
(While everything still is)
I use for my pen,
And roses and lilies
On window-panes are embossed,
To tell you of spring! Jack Frost.

FOR THE ADVOCATE.

Grandpa Goodale Papers.—No. 3.

MY DEAR CHILDREN: We must try hard to-night to get the story told about "How Barney Milked the Bays' Nest," but I must tell you first how it happened that Barney had only one name.

He told us the story in the funniest manner you ever heard.

"An' do ye know," said he, "in sure the house I was born in was a barn, and so they called me Barney."

"But what other name did you have?" we asked him. "Barney what?"

"Barney What is it?" he answered. "It is not Barney What at all, but niver a sprig of a name at all, but just Barney."

"But, Barney, what was your father's name?" we continued, in an earnest effort to bring him to the point.

"Me father's name, is it?" replied Barney. "Sure an' his name was Michael."

"But had he no family name, Barney?"

"Family name, is it? Sure an' there were tin childer of us."

"But, Barney, don't you know all men have two names? There's Farmer Baker has two names; his first name is Peter, but his name is Baker too."

Then Barney scratched his head, as he always did when studying up some story to tell us, and after awhile he straightened himself up and drew closer to us in his sort of an attempt to inspire confidence.

"I'll tell you," he said, raising his forefinger. "It was all owing to that pet pig."

"Owing to what, Barney?"

"To the pet pig, in shure. Do ye see this was the way uv it. Me father had a pet pig that kept roothin in the house, that warn't a house at all, but a barn; an' whin the prast, Hiven rist his sowl, was a christenin' uv me with the howly wather in a porringer on the top uv the bar'l, and had just sprinkled me wet with the howly wather and called me 'Barney,' be jabers, an' who should come in a roothin around but this same pig; an' he smilt out a corn nubbin under the bar'l, and what did the spalpeen do but root over the same with his snout, and upset all the howly wather; and, be gorra, the prast said he had no more howly wather at all for my other names, and so I must be contint with just 'Barney.' An' sure that is all the name at all I iver had."

We boys didn't always believe Barney's stories, but we liked to hear him tell them all the same; and we used to tell him stories about Irishmen just to tease him. I remember one that we told him—you may have heard it, but, if so, you can stop me—about an Irish sailor who one day went out hunting. He had never fired a gun in his life, and didn't know much about hunting, as you will see. After he had wandered around in the woods for some time he spied a woodpecker hammering away after a worm in the top of a tree. Tom says we must call these woodpeckers Picidæ. I shouldn't wonder, they are getting such queer names nowadays; but we called them woodpeckers when I was a boy. I used to shoot them, at first, because the farmers thought they injured the apple-trees by boring holes in them with their wedge-shaped bills; but after awhile I watched them, and I could see them put their heads down against the tree and listen, and sometimes they would move on a little way, clinging to the trunk with their stout feet, and then they would put their heads down and listen again, until they seemed to hear a worm moving inside; and then peck, peck, in would go the wedge, and I became certain, though I couldn't see it, that out would come the worm. I didn't shoot any more after that. Besides, they clung so hard to the tree that I often had to climb up after them; and I sometimes found them clinging to the tree after they were dead. Tom says they have a kind of gum in their months to stick the worms with; but I never saw any. But where did we leave the Irishman? Oh, he had just spied out one of these pretty black and white woodpeckers in the top of a tree. Well, he looked up at it awhile, and said he:

"Be jabers, I'll stop your thumpin'."

So he raised up his gun, and, without stopping to take aim, he let loose both barrels at once.

The gun was heavily loaded, and the recoil knocked the Irishman flat on to his back. But he gathered himself up and commenced searching among the leaves under the tree for the woodpecker, which had flown away unharmed. Of course he didn't find the woodpecker, but after awhile he found a toad (Tom wants to put in something here about toads, but I tell him there isn't time to-night,) which he caught by a hind leg, and, holding it up in triumph, he exclaimed: "Sure, an ye was a pretty bird afore I shot all the fedders off ye."

"Now, grandpa," says little Charlie, "mamma is calling us to go to bed again, and here you haven't told us the 'Bays' Nest story' yet."

The evenings are too short, my boy. They are getting longer, though.

GRANDPA GOODALE.

From Another Young Friend.

SALEM, ALA., February 27, 1875.

DEAR MR. EDITOR: I have read a good many letters from your little readers, and it always makes my heart bound with joy when I see them. I am another reader, and love your ADVOCATE dearly, for there is so much in it upon which my hungry mind can feed. I am sixteen now, and yet when I comprehend how much there is about the holy word unlearned I feel as weak in that knowledge as a little child. I have long wanted to write to you, and send all the little money I had. I want to do something; even if it be little it will be some help. By and by perhaps I may be able to do a great deal more. When papa first took the ADVOCATE I did not love to read it much, for I thought it was too dry; but now I know it was because my mind was corrupted from reading too much trash. Now there is no reading as sweet to me as that of the ADVOCATE. The things I have learned from it have lifted my mind up into a pure atmosphere. I must close. "Good-by.

Your little friend,

HATTIE BELLE PHELPS.

Saved by a Rabbit.

A pleasant instance of man's frequent obligation to the lower animals is told in the San Francisco Golden Era. A man owed his life to a jack-rabbit. He was a silver miner in Montana. One day, while at work down at the bottom of his shaft, the overhanging rock caved in and buried him alive. The rest of the story is in the man's own words.

There was nothing that I could do to release myself. I knew that if relief did not come from the outside I must perish. No one knew I had gone there. A road ran past the mouth of the shaft, but it was not traveled much, and I was not likely to attract attention by calling; nevertheless, I shouted at intervals all day. The following morning I commenced calling again; and all day, whenever I thought I heard a sound, I shouted.

When night came again all hopes of being released had abandoned me. One thing added great bitterness to my sufferings—I owed quite a large amount of money, and, should my fate remain unknown, my creditors would think I had tried to defraud them, and my name would be stigmatized.

I will not dwell on the agonies I endured. I am sorry I cannot forget them.

The morning of the fourth day of my imprisonment I heard something crawl into my grave. I lighted my candle and saw a rabbit. There was only one aperture large enough to admit him. I closed it to prevent his escape.

I saw in him food to appease my hunger, and my hand was raised to kill him, when a thought occurred to me that prevented the blow from descending. I had two fish-lines; their united length would reach to the road. I took off my shirt, tore it into strings, tied them together and on to the fish-line. I wore a long gold watch-chain; I tied it on to the part of the line that would cross the road. I then cut several leaves from my diary, wrote on them my condition, and tied them on to that part of the line that would be outside. I then tied the end made out of my shirt around Jack's neck and let him out. He soon reached the end of the line, and I knew by the way he was pulling that he was making desperate attempts to escape. Soon the tugging stopped, and, knowing gnawing to be one of Jack's chief accomplishments, I thought he had cut himself loose.

About three hours afterward I felt the line pulled; then some one called. I tried to answer, but the hoarse noise I made died in the cavern. I then pulled the line to show I was not dead.

All grew still again, and I knew the man had gone for assistance. Then came the sound of voices. I pulled in the line and it brought me food. It took all the men who worked in the shaft nine hours to reach me.

A very large pine-tree that grew near the shaft had been the cause of my misfortune. It had been dead a number of years, and the storm had blown it over. The terrible blow it struck the ground had caused the cave.

Jack had wound the line around a bush and tied himself so short that he was imprisoned outside as securely as I had been inside. He was taken to town, put in a large cage and supplied with all the rabbit delicacies the market afforded. He, however, did not thrive; and the boys, believing that he "pined in thought," voted to set him free. He was taken back to his old girdling grounds and set at liberty.

He not only saved my life, but he became the benefactor of all the rabbits in the neighborhood, the miners refraining from shooting any for fear it might be him.

USEFUL ADVICE TO BOYS.—To throw stones.—Fold each one carefully in a feather-bed, and give good notice to all the neighborhood when you are going to pitch.

To carry gunpowder in the pocket.—Soak it well in cold water, then wrap it up in a cover of oiled silk.

To slide down the banisters.—Let a surgeon sit upon the lower stair. Also carry a pailful of poultice in each of your hands, as you may need it.

To cure creaky boots.—Wear them always in going to the cake-pantry.

To be polite to sisters.—Get their big brothers to introduce you to them. Hearth and Home.

Farm, Garden and Household.

A Valuable Tree.

At the last meeting of the French Academy of Sciences an interesting communication was read from M. Gimbert, who has been long engaged in collecting evidence concerning the Australian tree, Eucalyptus globulus, the growth of which is surprisingly rapid, attaining, besides, gigantic dimensions. This plant, it now appears, possesses an extraordinary power of destroying miasmatic influence in fever-stricken districts. It has the singular property of absorbing ten times its weight of water from the soil, and of emitting antiseptic camphorous effluvia. When sown in marshy ground it will dry it up in a very short time. The English were the first to try it at the Cape, and within two or three years they completely changed the climateric condition of the unhealthy part of the colony. A few years later its plantation was undertaken on a large scale in various parts of Algeria. At Poudook, twenty miles from Algeria, a farm, situated on the banks of the Hamyze, was noted for its extremely pestilential air. In the spring of 1867 about thirteen thousand eucalyptus were planted there. In July of the same year, the time when the fever season used to set in, not a single case occurred; yet the trees were not more than nine feet high. Since then complete immunity from fever has been maintained. In the neighborhood of Constantine the farm of Ben Machydin was in equally bad repute; it was covered with marshes, both in winter and summer; in five years the whole ground was dried up by fourteen thousand of those trees, and farmers and children enjoy excellent health. At the factory of the Gue de Constantine, in three years, a plantation of eucalyptus has transformed twelve acres of marshy soil into a magnificent park, whence fever has completely disappeared. In the Island of Cuba this and all other paludean diseases are fast disappearing from all the unhealthy districts where this tree has been introduced. A station-house at one of the ends of a railway viaduct in the department of the Var was so pestilential that the officials could not be kept there longer than a year. Forty of these trees were planted, and it is now as healthy as any other place on the line.

Strawberry Culture.

No strawberry-grower need expect a good crop of berries unless he spreads a good coat of wheat or oat straw on his vines. Better pay $10 per ton than let them go without any mulching. Three years ago I tried the experiment of leaving one bed or land without any mulching, and there were few berries—hardly worth gathering. The patch which was mulched produced a fine crop, the yield being nearly one hundred bushels per acre. Had I not put on a good coat of straw the yield on two and a half acres would not have been more than thirty or thirty-five bushels. This experiment proved that my time and the cost of straw were well paid for. The quantity of straw used per acre should be about two and a half tons the first season. After the first season I would use one ton. I haul my straw over each bed, and throw off in piles in the middle of the bed, ten steps apart. Formerly I left roads wide enough for a wagon every three beds. I found this was a waste of land, and double the labor to scatter the straw; hence the past season I adopted the plan of going over each bed with wagon and team; the rows and plants were not damaged in the least, the ground being dry enough not to hurt the plants. In spring, as soon as the plants begin to grow, I rake the straw into middles, and leave it until the crop is taken off. Some growers advocate raking the straw entirely off the beds, and cultivate one time before fruiting; but I do not approve of this, having seen the trouble of one of my neighbors who tried this way. When he came to put the straw back, the spring rains and warm sun had rotted it; it was broken up, and he could not get more than half his beds covered. The consequence was, he had a fine lot of dirty berries for market, which returned no pay for his extra pains and labor. The ground being hoed up loose and light, made the rain scatter dirt all over his berries that had no straw around the plants. My plan is to rake the straw into the middle of the rows and around the plants. If weeds come before the berries are ripe, mow or cut them above the top of the ground with the hoe, and never stir the soil until after the crop is gathered.—Rural World.

CHANGING THE COLOR OF FLOWERS.—Chemists have long been familiar with the changes effected in the color of blue and purple flowers by alkalis and acids. European horticulturists have recently tried some interesting experiments in this way on living flowers. The effect of tobacco smoke (containing some ammonia) was first observed on the violet petals of Hesperis matronalis and Iberis umbellata, giving them a greenish tint. The suggestion was carried out by pouring ammonia in a dish and inverting a funnel over it. Flowers placed in the funnel-tube were rapidly changed—blue and purple to a fine green, the deep carmine in pinks and black, and white blossoms to yellow. Red and white parti-colored flowers were changed to green and yellow; red and white fuchsias became yellow, blue and green. Violet flowers were changed to red when sprinkled with water containing a small portion of nitric acid. A similar result took place by inclosing them in a box with muriatic acid gas. Dipped in water, most of these preserved their new colors several hours, and gradually returned to their original tints.

CULTIVATING ASPARAGUS.—Asparagus being a native of the seashore, requires for its successful cultivation salt or saline soil, either from natural causes or by applying salt as a top-dressing on the beds yearly after planting. In order to produce a fair crop of asparagus, sow the seed in early spring, in manured drills, very thinly, thinning the shoots out, if too thick, to about two inches apart. The drills should be about three feet apart, or, if preferred, can be at a greater distance, and beans or some other crop can be raised between the rows. The plants will be fit for transplanting the following spring, though some prefer two-year-old plants. This can be done in rows three feet apart, or in beds two feet apart in the rows, leaving a wider space on the outside of every fourth row. I usually plow as deeply as possible, then shovel out the furrow to about one foot in depth, put in six inches of well-rotted manure, set the plants about eighteen inches apart, cover the crown of the plant about four inches; the following spring level the ground, cultivate thoroughly, sow four or five bushels of salt per acre; late in the fall or winter cut the stems and lay them over the rows; cultivate again in the following spring as before, and in addition apply a good coat of manure. This season you can cut about one-half, or, better, one-fourth of the crop. The next season the greater part can be marketed off the early growth.

CRACKED WHEAT.—Cracked wheat is a very healthful as well as palatable dish, and I send my way of preparing it. If the wheat has not been thoroughly cleaned through a fanning mill it may be cleansed of foul stuff by covering it with salt and water. This causes the impurities to rise to the surface, when they can be easily poured off and the brine rinsed off with fresh water. It may then be dried in a gentle oven, so that it will grind more readily. When dry, take the quantity needed, bearing in mind that cooking swells the grain to twice its size. Run this through the coffee mill, if nothing better is at hand, grinding it rather course. Take a flour sieve and sift out the finer part of it. Then grease an iron kettle, to keep the wheat from burning on, and put it over the fire with considerable water—more than enough to cover the wheat. Hot water must be added from time to time while cooking it or it will become too thick. As soon as it boils set it where it will boil slowly two hours and a half or so. About twenty minutes before it is done stir in the finer portion of the wheat, that was sifted out, as this would cook too quickly if put in at first. After twenty minutes pour the wheat into any deep dish. When cold it may be turned out whole, and it looks nicely. It should have enough water in when done to pour out easily, as it thickens up when it cools. This may be eaten with cream and sugar, or with jelly of any kind; and, prepared in this way, it is an excellent dish for sick or well, and is not much trouble to prepare.—Farmer's Wife.

COLD FRAMES OR COLD BEDS.—These are constructed of common planks, usually about twelve inches high at the back, and eight inches high at the front; in width according to the length of the sashes to be used, and in length to suit the number of sashes required; the planks must be supported by durable posts firmly set in the ground, to which they are nailed. They should always be erected in a sheltered position, facing southward, if possible, and on ground nearly or quite level, or perhaps gently sloping to the south. Some use slides upon which to run the sashes up or down; these are very convenient. They are placed at such a distance apart that the edges of the sashes rest on the slides, and are separated by a narrow strip, thus making the operation of airing quite easy. The slides are dovetailed into the plank; hence they are held firm, and yet can be readily moved when occasion may require. The soil of a cold bed should be light, dry and free from stones, and enriched according to its intended use; for, if designed only as a place in which to preserve plants during the winter, moderate fertility is all that is required; but if used for growing and forcing crops for market, it must be made and kept rich by liberal applications of fertilizers.—Farm Gardening and Seed-Growing, by Francis Brill.

FALSE ECONOMY.—We do not believe that any of our readers are guilty of the following practices, but we will enumerate a few that a "Farmer's Wife," in the New York Tribune, complains of:

Stop putting lard into your butter; if we must eat hog's fat, pray give it to us pure, and not mixed with rancid butter.

Girl, stop dipping your fingers in the bucket of milk and wetting the cow's teats; of all dirty habits, this is the worst.

Wives, stop setting the cream jar in the family living-room to make the cream sour.

Husbands, stop hanging your sacks on that same cream jar to dry over night.

Women, stop putting your butter in the back bed-room, to stay till you are ready to go to market.

Ladies, stop holding your noses when you go into your cellars to attend to your milk. Might as well smell the rat and mold as to eat it daily in your butter and cream.

Women, stop telling fibs when you take your butter to the store. Did anybody ever know a woman to sell butter over a week old? Stop coloring your butter with annatto, and then asking folks if they can't taste the blue grass in it.

DRESSED MUTTON.—To have it as it should be, the dish must be lined with mashed potatoes, the mutton nicely minced and properly seasoned, placed in the dish, a little stock added, and then covered over with mashed potatoes roughed with a fork, and placed before the fire till the little dish assumes the appearance of a nicely-browned baked hedgehog. The hotter served the better it will be relished, provided it has only been allowed to simmer and not to boil.

RENOVATING BITTERS!!

Purify the Blood.

STRENGTHEN, INVIGORATE AND RENOVATE SYSTEM.

One of the best remedies known for the speedy cure of

DYSPEPSIA,

Loss of Appetite, Sour Stomach, Flatulence, Heartburn, Nausea, Fluttering of the Heart, Fainting Sensations, Sudden Flushes of Heat, Depression of Spirits or Melancholy, Water Brash, and Chronic or Nervous Debility. They are Diuretic, Tonic, Alterative and Stimulant. They perfectly eradicate all Bilious disorders arising from a foul stomach, strengthening the system and regulating the functions of the Liver.

Any one suffering with Weak Nerves, Deranged Liver, Kidney Complaint, Loss of Appetite, Fever and Ague, or any of the diseases or symptoms enumerated above, can be materially benefited and entirely cured by the use of these Bitters.

FOR FEMALES.

It is no established fact that fully one-half of the females are in bad health; or, in other words, never feel well. Many suffer with upward weakness. They feel languid, devoid of energy, extremely nervous, and have no appetite. To all these the Renovating Bitters are especially recommended. Such patients should resort to the use of these Bitters, the invariable result of which will be a strong and healthy constitution, a disappearance of all nervousness, a good appetite and a perfect restoration to health.

Thousands have testified to the merits of these Bitters. I would strongly advise all suffering with the above-named complaints to try them and be convinced.

Full directions accompany each bottle. Price, $1 per bottle, or six bottles for $5.

MRS. D. J. LOEWENSTEIN,
519.....MAGAZINE STREET.....519

Who has sold out her damaged stock of BOOTS, SHOES AND HATS, and is receiving an extensive stock of NEW GOODS, now arriving direct from the best manufacturers of the North, East and West. Having been carefully selected for this market, and bought for cash, they will be sold at astonishingly low prices—not to be beaten in this city. Then come and see the wonder, which will cost nothing, but you will carry away more Shoes and Boots, for less money, than you imagine. Do not fail to come. Look out for the sign of the WHITE LION. Orders from the country promptly attended to. de17 10m

FOUR SEASONS RESTAURANT.—JOHN BOSIO, proprietor of this old and favorite house, announces to his friends that he has removed to No. 155 Chartres street, between St. Louis and Conti streets, where, with enlarged premises and increased facilities, he will give them the best the market affords, at the same low prices as heretofore. Private Dining-Rooms up stairs. Also comfortably furnished rooms at reasonable rates. Thankful for the liberal patronage bestowed upon him in the past, he asks for a continuance of the same favors. On Saturday the market opened with a very good inquiry, and a disposition on the part of buyers to go on at Friday's prices or a shade off, but the movement was checked by most factors being still more stringent in their pretensions, hoping, in view of the probable extent of the demand, to establish a further advance. Operations were consequently confined during the morning to about 1,000 bales, and as the same restrictive influences prevailed for the rest of the day the entire business embraced only the moderate amount of 4,200 bales. We noticed more inquiry for the finer qualities. As high as 18c was offered for line, and 17½c. for a higher style than fair; middling fair to fair sold at 17c., and the high style of fair at 17½c. We also noticed sales of good middling at 16c. Strict low middling sold at 15½c. On Monday the movement showed very little animation at the opening, and up to noon only a few small transactions were reported, but later in the day the demand became more active, resulting in sales of 7,150 bales, nineteen brokerage houses participating in the business. Most factors adhered to their previous pretensions, but a few were willing to meet the demand more freely, and offers were accepted which had been previously refused. Hence some brokers reported that they bought at rather easier rates, while others were unable to fill their orders unless at full prices. On Tuesday the sales embraced 4,300 bales, mostly at full prices, without any quotable improvement.

The above makes an aggregate for the past three days of 15,850 bales, against 12,850 for the corresponding time last week and 18,250 the week before.

The receipts proper at this port since the first of September, exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas, are 894,433 bales, against 1,056,115 bales to the same date last year, and the decrease in the receipts at all the ports up to the latest mail dates, as compared with last year, is 155,890 bales. The decrease by the reports per telegraph is 161,357—3,092,930 against 3,254,277. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same date last year, there is an increase of 47,189 bales to Great Britain, and a decrease of 37,039 to France and 46,251 to other foreign ports. Advertisers' Directory

OF THE

NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

Alphabetically Arranged Under the Heads of the Business or Articles Advertised.

NOTE.—We take no advertisements except from those who we have good reason to believe are respectable and reliable. The publisher urges his solicitor and agents to seek the advertisements of the most worthy and reliable representatives in every branch of business, and not to apply to or accept business from persons of doubtful character. We have refused business to the extent of thousands of dollars each year for want of satisfactory information in reference to applicants. We think we may safely claim for the list below that it embraces, as a rule, the very best men and firms in the different branches represented.

SHADINES—SHADINES.

TO THE PUBLIC.

Five years since, after previous years of experience in the propagation and preservation of Shadines, or young shad, we first introduced our fish to the American people.

Shadines are put up in hermetically-sealed tin boxes, perfectly boneless, in a mild, pleasing, appetizing sauce, palatable to all, free from oil (so objectionable in sardines,) retaining only the natural richness of the shad, and ready for the table at all times—for dinner, lunch or evening meal—by merely opening the box. A daily want for every family during Lent.

Bear in mind, we are the original

THURSDAY, MARCH 18, 1875.

A College of Music.

It is announced that a wealthy gentleman in New York city intends to build and endow, during his lifetime, a college of music, to be located in New York, and dedicated "to the daughters of America." According to an account of the project given in the New York Times, the object of the institution proposed is two-fold: First, to protect and assist those who are gifted by nature to acquire a musical education, whether rich or poor, by affording them facilities such as cannot be obtained in any other part of the world; second, to give a high order of public musical entertainments that will amuse, instruct and delight the people, and by which the institution can be made not only self-sustaining, but will afford a liberal income. An elegant fire-proof building will be erected, about three hundred feet long by two hundred feet wide. It is intended that the endowment shall be sufficiently large to provide for the employment of the best talent in the world upon the corps of instructors, and to maintain all the appliances of a well-conducted educational institution. There will be a permanent chorus and orchestra, composed of advanced students, and daily rehearsals will be had of the grandest choral works of the great masters—oratorio, passion music, cantatas, masses, chorals, symphonic works, etc. Encouragement will be held out for the composition of such works by a judicious system of prizes. Classes will also be formed for the study and practice of smaller choral works, such as madrigals, part songs, for male and mixed voices, motets, etc. There will be a regular faculty of the college, composed of professors of music and professors of medicine. The science of physical culture will receive the most thorough attention, and will be under the direction of the physicians of the faculty. The science and art of elocution will also be taught by the best teachers to be found. The degree of doctor of music will be established and conferred upon students who may be qualified to receive it, and no pupil will be allowed to graduate without passing through a regular and thorough course of education. The terms and conditions of admitting students to the college will be wholly on a new basis. No fee will be required from any pupil, rich or poor, who is willing to devote, when qualified, a portion of his or her time in teaching, or in assisting in public entertainments.

Words for Dull People.

Remember, my dull friends, this doctrine of mine, that a thing may have value without having the first value, that a thing may be good without being the best, is in harmony with nature and revelation. Did the All-Wise make a world in which every object was of equal value and beauty? No. He filled the teeples with gorgeous trees and flowers. He painted the sky in its tints of beauty. But he made the violet and the daisy. Who dares despise the daisy? Who would have the banks without violets? God has orders and degrees of value, yet all are very good—a glory of the sun, another of the moon, another of the stars, terrestrial glory, celestial glory—one star differing from another star in glory. What does revelation say? The Master tells of servants to whom were given respectively ten talents, five and one. The ten gained other ten, and the Master said: "Well done." The five gained other five, and again he said: "Well done." No one else would have said so; the clever folks would have said: "Why did you not make ten as well, you rascal?" But the Master said: "Well done." And if the trembling defaulter had brought but one added talent to the one given, he would have heard, with no change in tones, no lessening of the glory, the same "Well done."

My dull brother, I want you, in the race of life, to take courage; I want you with your one talent to glorify God; I want you to go where the dull ones even shall shine as the stars. Take courage; you are running the race of life side by side with others whose feet are swift and strong. Don't falter. You cannot be first; try not to be last. But you say: "I shall be last, I fear; in spite of my best efforts, I cannot keep up with others." Never mind, Tom; somebody must be last; only don't leave the race in despair and throw your crown away. If you must be last, run your fastest—be in as soon as you can, and, spite of your wise folk with their wise notions, I know One who will come to you and put his cool hand upon your heated brow, and speak in voice so full of music that the angels will stop their singing to listen: "Never mind, Tom; he hath done what he could."—London Methodist Recorder.

A DEAD LETTER ROMANCE.—In 1835 Mr. John N. Hallett, now superintendent of the dead letter office, was a delivery clerk in the postoffice. A fine-looking, well-dressed lady came to his window one Friday morning and inquired for a letter for Mrs. Mary H. Russell. There was a letter. She called the next Friday morning. There was another letter. She called every Friday morning, and there was always a letter—if not in the morning, it came in the afternoon, and the lady returned and got it. They were all dropped letters, directed by the same hand, and Mrs. Mary H. Russell never got any other letters. This went on for thirty years, and Hallett still stood at his window. In the meantime the handwriting of the address showed signs of age, and the lady was gray and looked sixty. Hallett was transferred to the dead letter department, and a younger man took his place at the window. For a short time the lady came and got her letter, as of old. At length Hallett found a dead letter addressed to Mrs. Mary H. Russell. He knew the hand. The lady had then quit calling for her weekly missive. The letter was opened. It contained a $5 note and this sentence, without signature:

"More next Friday."

The letters continued to come, and they were all dead letters, and there was always $5 and "More next Friday." For ten years they have come—520 dead letters and 520 $5 bills. In one letter was the admonition: "Do not write." What could he mean? Who is he? and what has become of her? Still the weekly dead letter comes addressed to Mrs. Mary H. Russell, and forty years have passed away. The history of that correspondence is the history of two long lives. John N. Hallett, growing old at his postoffice window, saw the hair turning gray and the wrinkles multiplying on Mary H. Russell's face. Then he went to the dead letter office, and the letters followed him, but the old woman comes no more.

Budget of Brevities.

—The lifting power of plants is well illustrated by an oak-tree in South Hadley, Massachusetts. A rock had a seam in it, and a fibrous root from the oak crept in the seam, grew and lifted the rock, weighing over a ton, to a height of one foot.

—If the heat which a human being gives off in twenty-four hours could, consistently with life, be retained within the body, its temperature would, at the end of that time, have reached 185° Fahrenheit, a temperature above the point of coagulation of albumen, and high enough to cook the tissues.

—According to a Pittsburg newspaper the gray squirrels in the Alleghany valley are engaged in a general migration. They draw their recruits from all points, and may be seen daily swimming the river in large numbers and pursuing an easterly course. Old farmers say that such a migration has not taken place before since 1846.

—The commissioner of the Treasury Department of the United States says that the dutiable goods brought to this country by returning tourists as luggage, and which thus escape free of duty, amount to $129,000,000 per year; much of this is put upon the market as merchandise, and another portion is made up of commissions executed for third parties.

—The Khedive of Egypt has selected three of the Dartmouth medical students—Charles F. Brown, Frank A. Colby and Charles W. Dustin—to superintend the surgeon corps of his army. They start for Egypt early in December, only a few weeks after graduation, and expect to reach Cairo, their headquarters, in about six weeks. They are to serve on the Khedive's staff, and act immediately under his orders.

—Prof. Purser believes that the moon, in revolving around the earth and drawing the tides behind her, causes the latter to act as a brake on the revolution of the globe, and he considers that it may be mathematically shown that this action is slowly but surely checking the earth's speed of rotation, so that the days and nights are gradually lengthening. In a thousand million years or so they may become each a month long.

—At the close of the fiscal year, June 30, 1874, there were in operation in the United States 63 lines of railway postoffices, extending over an aggregate of 16,414 miles. The number of miles of actual service performed daily was 39,199, and annually 14,307,635. The number of clerks employed in this service was 859. Of the matter carried by the mails 82.82 per cent. consists of publications issued at stated intervals sent to regular subscribers, 7.8 per cent. of letters, and 9.12 per cent. of miscellaneous matter.

—The annual report of the commissioner of pensions shows that at the end of the fiscal year there were in the United States 209,073 army pensioners, with an annual aggregate pay of $23,595,573. There were also 3,336 navy pensioners, with an annual pay of $457,026; and 17,620 survivors of the war of 1812 who were pensioners, with an annual pay of $1,691,520. The total number of pensioners of all classes was 230,241, and the total pay was $26,351,071. There still remain on the pension rolls the names of 410 widows of soldiers of the Revolutionary war.

OSTRICH FEATHERS.—The raising of ostriches for the feathers, which form so important a feature of the stock in trade of the milliners nowadays, appears to have become quite an industry on the Cape of Good Hope, whither the business has recently been attracted from up the country. A correspondent saw a flock of twenty of them pasturing in a meadow near the observatory, and was surprised to learn that they were valued at $350 each. They fed on grass like cattle, and required very little care. Usually they are tolerably docile, but at certain seasons they become irritable, and will sometimes go so far as even to attack any person who happens to approach their vicinity. In such cases they do not make use of their beaks, but kick forward at their antagonist, and, as their legs are very powerful, and the middle toe terminates in a sharp and massive claw, if the blow strikes home it is sure to inflict a severe and not infrequently a fatal wound. When enraged they are not very easily beaten off, and one of them is a dangerous adversary for an unarmed man. Singularly enough, notwithstanding their long legs, a fallen log or a fence a foot high is to them an impassable barrier—they will never try to step over it. Each bird yields from $150 to $250 worth of feathers per annum, those from the females being gray and those from the males all black, except a single white plume which grows under each wing, and which is the most valuable of all. As in addition to the feathers a number of young birds are reared each year, and as the cost of keeping the flock is small, it will readily be seen that successful ostrich farming is a very lucrative operation.

Meerschaum Mines of Asia Minor.

The most extensive deposits of meerschaum in Asia Minor are about 24 miles southeast of the city of Eskischer, formerly Dorylea, the inhabitants of which, numbering about 12,000 Armenians and Turks, are principally employed in collecting or dealing in this mineral. It is obtained down in the earth, shafts or pits being sunk to a depth of 27 to 33 feet. Forty to fifty miners work in one mine and form a company, dividing the profits among themselves.

The stones are generally irregular in shape and vary greatly in size, being from the size of a nut to a square foot or more in size. The largest pieces are the most in demand and the dearest. The mineral when freshly dug is of a yellowish-white color, and covered about a finger thick with a red, greasy earth, so soft that it can be cut with a knife.

The treatment which the meerschaum must be subjected to before it is fit for export is very expensive and tedious. The pieces must first be freed from the adhering earth and dried for five or six days in the sun, or for eight or ten days in warm rooms. The mineral is then cleaned a second time and polished with wax. After this it is sorted into different grades, of which there are ten, and carefully packed with cotton in boxes for export. The stones lose two-thirds of their weight and volume in the operation of cleaning and drying.

The boxes are all one size, and each contains stones of the one quality. These boxes contain 30 to 80 large stones, 80 to 100 of medium size, 200 to 300 of the smaller ones, and 600 to 1,200 of the smallest pieces. The weight of a box is 24 to 35 oken (a little over a ton.) The price depends on the demand. The largest quantity is sent to Vienna and Germany, the yearly export being 8,000 to 10,000 boxes, having a value of $600,000.—Journal of Applied Chemistry.

Change of Color in Fishes.

The present French government, two years since, sent M. G. Pouchet on a scientific mission to the laboratory of living animals at Concarneau. He applied himself to the study of the changes of color in fishes. In his report to the government he gives an account of the minute anatomy of the masses of pigment which are the seat of the colors displayed by fishes, reptiles and batrachians, as well as some of the lower animals. These pigments are either liquid or solid, forming a granular mass. The cells in which they are contained he calls chromoblasts. During life these cells are dilated; but in death they are contracted, thus producing the livid hue often seen in dead fishes. This change in color is due to the nervous system, of which the facts that the chromatic functions of the chameleon are arrested during sleep, and that the colors of some fishes change when they are irritated, are proof. It sometimes happens that these changes of color are produced with extreme rapidity by the fish simply seeing some object which gives a shock to the brain. It is difficult to say whether this change of color is voluntary or not. The means of testing the action of the nervous system were to remove the eyes. When this was done the fish became of a color intermediate between the dark hues it assumed when placed on a dark bottom, and on a lighter sandy bottom; and this tint remained without change. He proves that the great sympathetic nerve produces this color. The point of departure, then, of this power of change in color is the retina, the impressions on which, communicated to the brain, react in the pigment cells of the skin, and the nerves regulate the action by the great sympathetic. In this connection it is interesting to record the latest discoveries concerning the blind fish in the Mammoth Cave, Kentucky, made by Prof. F. W. Putnam, of the Peabody Academy of Sciences, Salem, Massachusetts. In a recent exploration, he visited several caverns never before entered. His investigations have resulted in finding colored fish without eyes, exploding the theory hitherto held that all eyeless fish are colorless, and going to prove that it is really controlled by the great sympathetic nerve, at least in these fishes. White fish with eyes, and crawfish both with and without those organs, were obtained, presenting many new features of great interest to naturalists. A large variety of valuable archæological relics were found in the new chambers, such as skeletons of human beings, mounds, rude instruments, and the like.—Ladies' Repository.

IN SIAM men who are addicted to the habit of opium-smoking are allowed by law to pawn their wives and children into slavery, in payment of the debt incurred for the opium which prostrates their reason and disables them from providing for their families. In America the lovers of strong drink pawn their wives and children to shame and poverty and wretchedness most miserable that they may indulge in the liquid ruin dispensed by rum-sellers licensed according to law.

THURSDAY, MARCH 18, 1875.

NEWSPAPER ENGLISH OF 1884.

Picked up a paper here to-day,
And, by my conscience, I must say
That they do write in the funniest way!

Some time ago, over my cup,
Went sound asleep—just woke up;
Must have been—well, let me see—
Eighteen hundred and ninety-three.
Cow came along, bell without tinkle;
Roused me up, scared old Winkle;
Fell asleep, by their account,
One and thirty years ago.

Rest that paper? I was struck
All in a heap, sir, just my luck;
"Miss Sayers Smither'll elocute
Next Thursday evening." I stood mute;
Never in all my life had heard
Of such an outlandish, barbarous word.
Elocute! Elocute! I declare!
Bit my whiskers, pulled my hair;
Looked in my Webster—'twasn't there;
Gave the thing up in wild despair—
Said to myself: It's mighty quair!

Pretty near choked myself with rage;
Papers set forth on another page—
Wonderful piece of local news:
"People up town are going to cultivate;"
And then the thing got worse and worse:
"To-morrow the people commence."

"July Fourth—happy—happy to state—
People all going to decorate;"
Think I'd better shut up shop;
"Mr. A. B. is a philanthrop;"
And then, look here; why, bless my eyes,
What in the world is "Bismarck-ize?"

Eyes of mine, you can't be trusted!
"Coal-oil factory all combusted!"
"Decumber each your favorite fruits;"
"Mexican empire revolutes;"
And since the days I went to school,
What sort of thing's a "perpendicule?"

Reading along—why, bless my fate!
There's a man who's going to "orate."
Why, what on earth's this paper about?
Go stark mad if I don't find out.
Must be French, and yet I vow
Never heard of the word till now.

Folding paper, undecided—
Hear me! some one's "homicided."
Laid down paper right away;
For, by my conscience, I must say
That they do write in the funniest way.

Blessing in Business.

There are two ways of making money. One is by grasping every possible penny, never letting it go, except to send it out after more of its fellows; and even when it goes for that purpose the parting is painful and its return with its spoils eagerly watched for. This method is undoubtedly successful in a large number of cases. The attendant anxiety and mental distress are unheeded. Body and soul are united in the great struggle, and nothing is too precious to sacrifice for the accomplishment of the purpose. Employees are considered merely appendages of the business, and are treated only as parts of a machine, to be replaced as speedily as possible when unfit for service. The wealth which may thus pour into the coffers comes bringing no cheer. Those who help to make it do it without enthusiasm, except it be in the enjoyment of the work itself. Conscience may make them faithful in giving all that they promise; but there is no devotion in their service, and they call no blessing upon the master whom they serve perhaps with fidelity, but certainly without affection. Many of the great fortunes of New York have been accumulated in this manner—some avowedly so.

Happily, however, this method is not universal. There is another and a better way. There are successful business men who have not forgotten Christ's second commandment, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," and have recognized their "neighbor" even in their errand boy. In the prosperity of such, all who are in any way concerned with them rejoice, and the larger their business and the more they can employ the more are there to bless them.

In an establishment conducted in this Christian spirit an infidel was employed. He was almost crazed by the death of his only son, and soon after fell sick of typhoid fever. Seven months passed, and he raved of his lost place, which was an important one. The assurances of his wife and others about him could not convince him that he need not be troubled, and, hearing of his distress, the principal member of the firm sent a special messenger, telling him "to feel no anxiety; his place was only temporarily filled, and was ready for him whenever he could take it." After a year's absence the man returned, no longer an infidel. The kindness of his employers proved to him a gospel message, which had turned his heart in love and gratitude to the Father who, he felt, cared for him.

Last spring a young widow, with a child and her aged parents to support, was forced to resign her situation. "Why?" asked the managing man in the establishment, and who is a worthy representative of the firm in their generous dealing. "I am unable to work, and am about to undergo a painful operation." "Do not resign; your place shall be kept open for you," was the reply. And the poor woman went away from the office with two months' salary advanced to her, with an assurance that she should have help in paying her physician's bill, and with words of sympathy and advice which she can never forget.

Not only are the valuable assistants treated thus, but an errand boy, known, as he supposed, only in the basement, received his salary, without intermission, during a seven months' siege of rheumatism.

A lady who has been in their employ some years, and from whom we have these facts, has on three or four occasions been compelled, by her own sickness and that of those dependent upon her, to leave her work for several weeks at a time. As regularly as Saturday came, came also the salary, with kindly inquiries from the office, and many little things were done which, in the words of the grateful recipient, were "as much as the money." More perhaps, for through trial and sorrow they helped a brave heart to battle with obstacles which even that brave heart, without human sympathy, might have failed to overcome.

The head of this house has been recently knighted by a foreign government for his important contribution to the material prosperity of the world. But this is not the beginning of his knighthood. The champion of the poor and suffering, in whatever age, belongs to a royal order which receives its reward from the court of heaven.

Though it may not be possible for many to scatter benefactions with such lavish hand as in the instances noted, the spirit which prompted them may be cultivated in the humblest position of command, and the one clerk in the remotest country store, and the chore boy, may feel themselves taken into a partnership of good will, whose stock is continually multiplied, being increased by division.—Christian Weekly.

Anecdotes of Sir Walter Scott.

"Some Old Letters," in Scribner for March, are accompanied by a hitherto unpublished life sketch of Sir Walter Scott, by the celebrated artist, Gilbert Stuart Newton. In this instalment of "Old Letters" we find the following anecdotes of the author of "Waverley:"

"At half-past six we went to dine with the Fergussons. The doctor was quite ill with a cold. Sir Adam Fergusson, Sir Walter Scott's intimate and confidential friend, dined there; ourselves, Mrs. L. and one of her daughters.

"We had a very charming dinner, for Sir Adam has the most marvelous powers of description. He made us laugh heartily, and told us, too, a great many interesting anecdotes about Sir Walter Scott. He is a very remarkable person himself. He is the original of Dugald Dalgetty." This is all I find in the old letters about the dinner, but I must tell what I can recollect of the account Mrs. X. gave me of it in later years. Sir Adam, she said, was a tall, gray-haired man, with a broad Scotch accent. He described how one early morning, in Sir Walter Scott's library, when he and Sir Walter tried to make the fire of peat buru, and, after many efforts, succeeded in some degree, at this moment one of the dogs, dripping from a plunge in the lake, scratched and whined at the window. At last Sir Walter let the "puir creature" in, who, coming up before the little fire, shook his shaggy hide, sending a perfect shower-bath over the fire and over a great table of loose manuscripts. Sir Walter, eyeing the scene with his usual serenity, said slowly: "Oh! dear, ye've done a great deal of mischief." It reminds us of the tale related of Newton. On this same occasion of the dinner Sir Adam Fergusson told of traveling with Sir Walter on the Continent and going to see the troops on donkeys, and he performed both donkeys and riders with his fingers on the table until his audience was in an agony of laughter.

"Fergusson passed the evening with us, and we had some music. I asked him, as he was so fond of listening, if he didn't sing a little himself. 'I'll tell you an anecdote of Sir Walter Scott,' said he, 'that will answer your question. One night, when I was staying at Abbotsford, Anne Scott had been singing to the accompaniment of her harp a Scotch ballad with a wail for the chorus. Sir Walter turned to me, saying in his strong Scotch accent: 'Noo, Fergusson, gie us a howl.'"

"'During one of my visits there,' continued Dr. Fergusson, 'among other guests was Hogg, "the Ettrick shepherd." I heard a horrible noise in an adjoining room, and, after listening some moments to it, became alarmed, and said to my host: "What is that noise?" "Oh!" said he, "it's Hogg—just Hogg composing his verses. He always sings them as he writes them."'

"Though he liked some rude strains, Scott could well attune his ear to softer music, and was very fond of the Moore song Anne sings, that ends:

"'Short as the Persian's prayer, his prayer at close of day,
Should be each vow of lover's repeating,
Quick let him worship beauty's precious ray;
E'en while he kneels that ray is fleeting.'

"He used to say: 'Come Anne, let me have that Persian's prayer;' and he would listen with great delight to the singing of it.

"They recalled an amusing story of an old servant who had lived with Scott for nearly a lifetime, and became very much spoiled. Sir Walter at last, out of patience with his sins of omission and commission, said:

"'Donald, I think we must part.'

"'Part! Why? Where's your honor going?"

"Of course peace was made, and Donald remained.

"They told sadly of the dear old man returning from Italy (where he went for his health,) with his memory impaired. Mrs. Arkwright, who had set his 'Pirate's Farewell to Minna' to music, sang it to him. 'Those are very pretty verses,' said Sir Walter. 'Who wrote them?'

"Charles Scott, Sir Walter's second son, is a very clever, agreeable man. I see a good deal of him at the Lockharts, here and elsewhere. Sir Walter was most proud of his eldest son Walter, who is rather a dull fellow, but large and fine-looking. His father used to say that it was enough if a boy knew how to ride and speak the truth; those were the most important things.

"Charles Scott made me laugh about the visitors at Sir Walter's house and Melrose Abbey. See the abbey by moonlight they must, because of the lines:

"'If thou wouldst view fair Melrose aright,
Go visit it by the pale moonlight.'

"'And many a time,' said Charles Scott, 'when the moon was not convenient, I took a lantern to produce the effect.'"

WHAT WILL PEOPLE SAY?—This question makes the mind homeless. Do right and fear no one; thou mayst be sure that with all thy consideration for the world thou wilt never satisfy the world. But if thou goest straight forward on thy way, not concerning thyself with the friendly or unfriendly glances of men, then thou hast conquered the world, and it is subject to thee. By heeding the question: "What will people say?" thou becomest subject to the world.—Auerbach.

MIND and heart will meet, though forbidden, like hidden lovers.—Bailey.

Belgian Farms.

Turning to one of the most fertile parts of Belgium, all is charming—every road is bordered with trees; not a rise in the ground is seen; all is calm, uniform, and presents an image of quiet comfort and peace. Each house is detached, and surrounded with large apple orchards, hedged in by box, holly or hawthorn, where the cows are brought to feed every morning and evening. It is of one story only, and thatched, containing four rooms—the first for meals, the second for the dairy and preparing the food for cattle, the others for sleeping-rooms. The old-fashioned oak furniture is a model of brightness; tin and copper utensils shine on the walls, which are whitewashed. The garden is gay with wallflowers, dahlias and hydrangeas, and the florists' flowers which are to be shown at Ghent.

Outside everything is in its place; nothing spoils the greensward; the ditch and manure heap are banished; the latter is always under the roof of the stable or cow-shed. In this stand five or six large cows, the constant care of the farmer's wife, who gives them abundance of green meat in summer, with straw chay, and a kind of warm soup, mixed with carrots, turnips or rye, in winter. Thanks to this nourishment, and the constant rest they enjoy, the animals give from fifteen to twenty-five quarts of milk daily. The tools are simple, but of first-rate construction; the plow is light, drawn by one horse, and works with ease, rapidity and regularity. The harrows are of various kinds, triangular, rectangular or in parallelogram; but the special tool with which the Flemming has fertilized sands, dried up marshes, and forced back the sea, is the spade. The proverb on the banks of the Scheldt is: "The spade is a gold mine to the peasant;" and different kinds are made for light or heavy soil.

The fields are mostly square, and rarely contain more than an acre; the ground is curved symmetrically, the center being the highest, so that the water drains down equally in all directions. Round the field, and a foot lower, extends a strip of grass, three or four yards wide; still lower, a hedge of elders is planted, which is cut every seven years; and, finally, the plot is surrounded by a ditch, bordered with trees of larger growth. Thus each piece furnishes rich grass, firewood every seven years, and timber for building every thirty years. The plow is generally used; but every seven years the subsoil is turned to the top by the spade, and thus it acquires a depth unknown to all but the best gardens; the principal object being to produce flax and butter, not cereals. The best farmers never sell their corn, but allow their cattle to consume it.

Unhappily the farm laborer there, as elsewhere, does not enjoy much comfort; working harder than most men, he is the worst fed. Rye bread, potatoes, beans, buttermilk, without meat or bacon, is the usual fare, chicory the constant drink; beer is reserved for Sundays and fair-days. His wages vary from tenpence to a shilling, and he could never live upon it did not all the members of his family work without ceasing. When the day's work is ended, often by moonlight, the father cultivates his small field; his wife and daughters take up the poorly-paid lace work, instead of the old spinning-wheel, which steam has superseded; and his sons, when their field work is done, bring up rabbits for the London market. Their little hands pick up every tuft of herbage on the roadside, and open up a large trade of exportation not to be despised. From Ostend alone there comes to us one million two hundred thousand rabbits every year. These are skinned and cleaned in Belgium, where the skin is used for the making of hats. Yet, though their life is so hard, the towns do not attract the rural population. Habit and family traditions bind them to the plow; while every nine years, at the renewal of their lease, the raising of the rent fills them with anxiety and poisons their existence. It makes them distrust all those who are making inquiry on the state of agriculture, and dissimulate as to the fertility of their land, and the produce they obtain from it.—Chambers' Journal.

Informal People.

Preserve us from unceremonious people—those men and women who "never stand on ceremony," who are always perfectly at home in other people's houses! Society has many pests, but few so intolerable as they. "Free and easy" visitors are most thoroughly disagreeable. They will inflict themselves upon you at any time, and expect to be always cordially welcomed, because they are so free and easy, and so loth to put anybody to trouble. They will come before breakfast, or just as you are sitting at dinner, and draw up their chairs quite like one of the family. Early in the morning they delight to "run in," and they will come right up to your chamber to save you the trouble of coming down, and there they will sit and watch you make your toilet, and comment on how gray your hair is getting, and wonder if you are not a great deal stouter and redder in the face than you used to be. They will hunt over your writing desk for note paper; bathe their faces with your cologne-water, and scent their handkerchiefs with the contents of your choicest perfumery bottle. They are always ready for luncheon—"You know I'm too much at home in your house to go hungry, my dear"—and any stray confectionery lying about melts before them as dew before the sun. They make no scruple of borrowing your latest magazines and novels; even your wardrobe does not escape their encroachments; and all this insolence is cloaked by some such empty remark as this: "I never stand on ceremony, but make myself at home everywhere; so don't put yourself out to entertain me!" Again we pray: Preserve us from unceremonious people!—The Scotsman.

Scurrilous Postal Cards.

The following is the account, from the New York Tribune, of the first conviction for sending scurrilous postal cards through the mails. As such, it is of general interest. It is a pity that the same law did not apply to the sending of scurrilous letters as well.

"Moses Chamberlain, an old, wealthy and previously respectable citizen, was arraigned for sentence, in the criminal branch of the United States Circuit Court, before Judge Benedict, on conviction of an indictment containing fourteen counts, charging him with as many violations of the United States postal laws, in sending scurrilous postal cards to Aaron Van Valkenburgh, who owed him a small amount of money, but had been freed from his debts by the bankruptcy act. The testimony showed that these cards contained such epithets as 'Dear thief,' 'Dear scoundrel,' 'Dear swindler,' etc., and denounced and threatened Van Valkenburgh for not paying his debts. This was the first conviction for this offense in this district.

"When Chamberlain rose to receive sentence every eye was upon him. He is of tall and commanding figure, very respectable in appearance, and looked more like a professional man than a convict arraigned for sentence. His counsel, Mr. Warling, pathetically addressed the court in mitigation of sentence. His client was nearly seventy years of age, of feeble health, and had long been in the hands of a physician on account of his sufferings from acute dyspepsia, symptoms of Bright's disease of the kidneys, and the exhibition of curious phrases of monomania, resulting from disordered nerves. He requires air and exercise, and confinement in prison would doubtless prove fatal to him. This statement was supported by a physician's certificate.

"Judge Benedict, in passing sentence, said: 'You have been convicted of many offenses against the laws of your country, an intelligent and impartial jury having found you guilty of fourteen distinct crimes. No one at the trial could entertain the least doubt of your guilt. The scurrilous epithets used by you were written to force the payment of money to which you were not legally entitled. You are liable to a sentence which would exhaust the remainder of your life. It is necessary for the community to understand that those who use the postoffice for purposes of extortion by means of scurrilous postal cards must be punished. In the hope that you will hereafter obey the law, and in consideration of the circumstances in which you are placed, I will not subject you to the ignominy of imprisonment, but shall impose a fine sufficient to admonish you how unprofitable your course has been. I will limit the sentence to the first count, and suspend sentence on the other thirteen. This will be a very light sentence, considering the persistent manner in which you have repeated your offenses, and the fact that your position and intelligence are of such a character as to have given you full knowledge of the gravity of your violations of the law, thus rendering them less excusable. I fine you $5,000 on the first count of the indictment, suspending sentence on the others, and you will stand committed until the fine is paid.'

"Chamberlain, who had watched the judge with almost breathless attention while sentence was being passed, appeared greatly relieved when the ordeal of standing in his humiliating position was no longer necessary, and quickly arranged with his counsel to pay his fine to United States Marshal Fiske, who soon afterward received it, and Chamberlain left the court-room a free but much sadder, wiser and poorer man than he was before the criminal proceedings were commenced against him. His legal expenses and fine amounted to about $10,000, while his claim against Van Valkenburgh is said to amount to only about one-tenth of that sum."

CHINESE IDEA OF RAILROADS.—A Chinese newspaper, published at Shanghai, protests against the construction of railroads in China, and adduces several very curious reasons against them. In the first place, it is of opinion that the introduction of railroads in Europe is of too recent a date to admit of a judgment as to their real utility. Then it urges that there is not sufficient business in China to make railroads profitable, and that their effect would be to accumulate a vast quantity of goods in the ports, faster than they could be shipped. Finally, it says: "Accidents on the railroad lines are very numerous, caused by collisions, by the engines or tenders taking fire, by the trains running off the lines, or by the bridges giving way and the trains being precipitated into the rivers below. In other cases the carriages are injured by the great speed at which they are carried along, and the accidents are so numerous that it is often impossible to ascertain the exact number of dead and wounded. All the foreign journals are full of details concerning these accidents. But admitting that most of these casualties are preventable, and that the trains follow their regular course, they travel quicker than the thoroughbred horse, and the people walking on the lines would have no time to get out of their way. From this cause alone the number of fatal accidents would be enormous. In all countries where railroads exist they are considered a very dangerous mode of locomotion, and, beyond those who have very urgent business to transact, no one thinks of using them."—Christian Intelligencer.

AN ENGLISH clergyman suggests interment as a substitute for cremation. He states his plan thus: "Funeral steamers might be provided, which, proceeding to a distance from land, could deposit the remains beyond the reach of desecration, and whence injury could not result to the living."

AN ELEGANT imitation of marble is made in Dresden for architectural purposes by impregnating sandstone with silicic acid and alumina. In Naundorf such stones are prepared which are intensely white, transparent and capable of taking a polish. By the introduction of suitable pigments in the impregnating mass any desired color is produced. It is stated that the cost is much less than real marble, while it resists heat better.

M. MEUNIER has recently advanced the theory that the planet Mars is much older than the earth, because of the rarification of its atmosphere and the small extent of its seas. The form of the latter, he says, is exactly that which the terrestrial oceans would assume after partial absorption by the earth's crust. If, for example, the Atlantic were absorbed so that only that portion included in the contour made by the uniform depth of twelve thousand feet were left, the shape would be exactly similar to that of some of the seas recognized in Mars.

WE LEARN from the Mining and Scientific Press that a field of cryolite has been discovered in Nevada, sixty miles northeast of Reno. This valuable mineral, which has become an important source of sodium and its compounds, and metallic aluminum, has heretofore only been found, in considerable quantities, at Evigtok, twelve miles west of Arksut, in West Greenland. It is shipped in large quantities to Natrona, Pennsylvania. A company there have a monopoly of all the cryolite imported. If the Nevada story proves true it will be an important addition to the financial wealth of the nation.

A FIRELESS stove for street cars is being tried by a street car company in Columbus, Ohio. It is described as a small iron box placed under the car seat, containing necessary pipes and valves, and filled with water. The heat is supplied at the depot. A small upright boiler, not higher than a man of ordinary stature, and consuming not more coal than a large heating stove, supplies the steam. By means of rubber hose the steam is introduced into the stove through a pipe which projects from the outside of the car. The condensed steam heats the water to two hundred and twelve degrees, and the car is heated and ready for travel. In a trip of one mile and return in about forty minutes the stove only loses thirty degrees of heat, and the temperature of the car is kept pleasant.

SUICIDE OF A SCORPION.—Mr. Bidie communicates to Nature a fact which proves the correctness of the story that the scorpion will sting itself to death when surrounded by a fire. His servant brought him one morning a very large specimen of the common black scorpion of southern India. To keep it safe it was placed in a glass entomological case, and after a few hours, to obtain a better view of the insect, the case was carried to the window. The light and heat of the sun seemed to irritate it very much, and when the rays were focused on its back by means of a small lens it exhibited great agitation, running about hissing and spitting. This experiment was tried four or five times, with the same result; but finally, when the lens was used, the scorpion turned up its tail, and, "quick as lightning," plunged the sting into its own back. The stroke was followed by a sudden escape of fluid, and in a moment the creature was dead. This occurrence shows that animals may commit suicide, and that the poison of some animals may be destructive to themselves.

THE TELEPHONE.—The wonder to all who have heard about the instrument is how the telephone sends its music over the wires. It is explained as follows: A telephone sending instrument consists of an open funnel in which the tone is sounded, and a diaphragm of thin rubber or other suitable elastic membrane, which is set in vibration by the tone, and which, by its vibrations, continually makes and breaks the electric circuit. The number of breaks in a second corresponds exactly with the number of vibrations belonging to the tone sounded; and since the current passes at the other end of the line around a soft iron bar, constituting the well-known helix, this bar is magnetized and demagnetized alternately, as many times in a second as there are vibrations in the tone sounded at the sending instrument. But each magnetization, when the circuit is broken, causes a longitudinal shrinkage of the bar. Hence it is only necessary to place the bar on a delicate sounding-board, which receives and renders audible its vibrations; and by this ingenious device of the sounding-board is made to vibrate with the exact rate of the original tone, and thus the note sounding at one end of a telegraphic line may be instantaneously reproduced at the other.—The Alliance.

SPECTRUM analysis has recently found a very pretty application in the assaying of metals used for coinage. The idea is due to Mr. Lockyer, who was led to it by experiments upon metallic spectra made for quite a different purpose. If the spark from a powerful induction coil is made to pass between two pointed wires or electrodes of the metal to be examined, separated by a distance of about half an inch, the interval between them will become more or less filled with the vapor of the metal. In the immediate neighborhood of the points this vapor will be denser, hotter and more luminous than in the middle of the spark, and the spectrum of the light proceeding from that portion of the spark which is nearest the electrodes will exhibit many more bright lines than the light from the center. Now set up a spectroscope at a distance of a foot or so from the spark, and place between the spark and the spectroscope a convex lens, so adjusted as to form upon the slit of the instrument a little image of the points and the spark, just as the lens of a photographer's camera forms an image of the sitter on the sensitive plate. We shall then get a spectrum, the edges of which are formed by light coming from the neighborhood of the electrodes, while its central portion is due to the light from the middle of the spark; and it will be found that, while the principal lines of the metal reach across the whole width of the spectrum, numerous others reach only part way, and some are very short indeed—hardly more than mere luminous points on the edges of the spectrum. If the electrodes used, instead of being made of pure metal, are made of metal slightly alloyed, some of the lines of the alloying metals will also be exhibited, and the spectrum of the principal metal will itself be profoundly modified. Lines which before were strong and bright will become feeble; some which reached clear across the spectrum will be thinned out or even cut in two in the middle; the short lines will be made shorter still, and some of them will entirely disappear. Gold, which is not a very volatile metal, has a spectrum which is especially sensitive to the effect of alloy; and, since this effect depends upon the amount of the alloy, and is considerably altered by even a slight change in the per centage of the foreign metal, we thus obtain a very delicate method of determining whether a coin is above or below the standard. It is only necessary to compare its spectrum with that of a pair of electrodes known to be of standard purity by previous assay. If the coin in question be debased, the lines of gold in its spectrum will be shorter and less conspicuous than the standard, and vice versa. If, moreover, the experimenter is provided with an extended series of such standards, in which the amount of alloy varies, he can in a few minutes determine to which of these standards the coin he is examining corresponds, and so ascertain, and that very accurately, the per centage of its alloy. It is found that the delicacy of this method is quite comparable with that of the best chemical work, and the saving of time and expense is very great. As yet, however, there remains some practical difficulties, which must be overcome before it can fully take the place of the ordinary methods of assaying.—Independent.

AN important paper was read before the British Association this year by Prof. Ferrier, on the localization of the functions of the brain. He alluded to the popular belief that different parts of the brain subserve different functions of the mind, and also mentioned the opposing views of Brown-Sequard and others that no part is devoted to any particular function. Extensive tracts of the brain may be destroyed without any resultant effect on the mind. Other lesions have, however, an opposite significance. Thus the disease of a particular part of the brain is followed by aphasia, or the inability to express one's self in words. Certain tumors or lesions in particular parts of the brain give rise by their irritation to epileptiform convulsions of the whole of one side, or of the arm or leg, or of the muscles of the face; and from a study of the way in which these convulsions exhibit themselves he became able to localize the lesions exactly. Three years ago Fritsch and Hitzig, two German physiologists, by passing galvanic currents through the brains of dogs, produced results in the flexion, extension, adduction, etc., of the limbs through muscular contraction. Dr. Ferrier adopted a similar method in experimenting on the brains of various species of animals, being instigated thereto by a knowledge of the fact that nervous diseases, as epilepsy, chorea, etc., are produced by irritation of portions of the brain. He employed one hundred individuals of the species fish, frog, fowl, pigeon, rat, guinea pig, rabbit, cat, dog, jackal, monkey. The top of the skull was removed while the animal was kept insensible by administration of chloroform. The animals, on recovering consciousness, did not indicate suffering; a monkey on one occasion eating bread and butter and catching flies, with his brain entirely exposed. On applying the electrode of the battery to a portion of the superior external convolution of the cat's brain, the animal lifted its shoulder and paw on the opposite side to that stimulated, as if about to walk forward. Stimulating other parts of the same convolution, it brought the paw suddenly back, or put it out as if to grasp something, or brought forward its hind leg as in walking, or held back its head as if astonished, or turned it on one side as if looking at something, each according to the particular part stimulated. A similar treatment of the lower external convolution produced certain movements of the angles of the mouth. The animal opened the mouth, wildly moved its tongue, and uttered loud cries or mewed in a lively way, sometimes starting up and lashing its tail, as though in a furious rage. The stimulation of another part of this convolution caused the animal to screw up its nostrils on the same side. It is from this point that the nerves originate which are distributed to the nasal muscles. Similar results were obtained from the experiments on the other animals. Dr. Ferrier was also able to produce epileptic convulsions of all kinds, as well as movements resembling those of St. Vitus' dance. He also produced some expressions of the face, showing their approximate cause. For instance, the tendency to retract the angle of the mouth when strong exertion is made with the right hand was proven to be due to the fact that the points on the brain whence the stimulus is derived for the contractions of the respective muscles are very close together, so that the stimulus easily passes from the one point to the other. Ideas were also excited by this kind of irritation by galvanic currents, but what they were was not easily ascertained. Stimulation of the corpora striata caused the limbs to be flexed; of the optic lobes produced no result; of the anterior pair of the corpora quadrigemina an oscillation of the pupil and a tendency to opisthotonos; of the hinder pair, a great variety of noises; of the cerebellum, movements of the eyeballs.—Independent.

Charles Sprague.

The author of the poem called "Curiosity," Charles Sprague, Esq., has just departed this life, at the advanced age of eighty-four. For this poem Mr. Sprague, who was a true and hearty patriot, deserves most honorable commemoration by his countrymen; since our cousins over the water, when it reached them, styled its author "the American Pope." The poem was in Pope's hexameter, a measure in which English, according to our fancy, appears to as much advantage as under any poetical drapery whatever—to vastly greater advantage than when it is made to play rhetorical antics, in lines of all lengths and verses of all sizes. It would not distress us so much to have hexameter hymns as to have hymns of all patterns—as if hymns, in this age of novelties, must be manufactured by a hymnological Jack-at-all-trades. We do not mean to be irreverent or contemptuous; but has it become one of our scientific necessities that hymns must be like human faces—scarcely any two of them alike?

But to come back to Mr. Sprague. He delivered his poem in 1827, to an audience brimful of literary culture, and at one of the commencements of Harvard University. He had not received a liberal education—was a cashier of a Boston bank, or as he touchingly expressed it:

"To life's coarse service sold,
Where thought lies barren, and naught breeds but gold."

And being a sincerely modest and diffident man, he was evidently timid and embarrassed. But his audience was running over with geniality, was kindly appreciative, and cheerfully encouraged him. He rose to the occasion, pronounced his poem with exquisite elocution, and went off with the highest plaudits. We have not the poem at hand, and must therefore draw on a memory which has to run back nearly half a century. But this memory was young and fresh, and some of its impressions are still clear and vivid. For instance, he arrayed the appetite for curiosities as battening on four wonders then in full exhibition at Boston, with hundreds after hundreds running for self-gratification. He put them all into one group, and concentrated them into a single couplet:

"A monstrous pumpkin, or a mammoth hog,
A female atheist, or a learned dog."

His dexterity took his audience completely by surprise. A smart preacher could not have lessened Fanny Wright (one of the wonders) in a dozen sermons so effectually, so profoundly as he did by putting her into the company of an overgrown vegetable and astounding brutes. Literary dignity and sobriety utterly gave way; and when they do, we know it is as when the earth quakes and sinks and groans. Such clapping and stamping and kicking and pounding and shouting and screaming—aye, yelling—an Indian war-dance could not outvie. And they came in surges. When one wave had passed another rolled after it, until the poor old wooden meeting-house (it was Dr. Holmes,' the American annalist, and father of the poetical doctor) seemed ready to tumble on the heads of the sons of uproar.

To this succeeded two pictures, which we still recall distinctly, and which proved that, as a satirist, he might have become the American Juvenal. One was of the Pharisaical devotee, who tries, as the monks do, to make us think that he is as staid and grim within as he appears to be without. He will not allow him to extinguish the impressibleness of human nature. So he shows how little it takes to break the crust of his icy self-possession:

"And if two dogs beneath his window fight,
He'd give his Bible to enjoy the sight."

After him came the usurer—a specimen of humanity with which Mr. Sprague had to be wearily familiar at the financial center of a great commercial city. His unsparing description of him wound up with a distich which made some as palely sober as they had just been ruddily mirthful:

"Alas for Isbal if, in its awful plan,
Heaven deal with him as he has dealt with man."

However, this short article is not intended for a review, but simply as a reminiscence of one who might and perhaps ought to have accomplished more, and thus deserve more richly of his times and of his country. But Mr. Sprague was not one of the fame-bitten. He loved retirement and quiet, and genuine literary comfort, with a nice book or a genial friend. Still history owes him an honorable tribute; and we hope it will be given by an edition of his works which any library may be proud of.—Rev. T. W. Coit, D. D., in the Churchman.

Poverty.

Poverty is a great curse, despite of all the fine sentiment we hear about it from people in warm homes, who are well fed and have good clothes on their backs. It embitters manhood; it saturates woman's heart with gall. It begets envy and fretfulness with one's lot; it makes men roll fiery eyes and utter hard speeches on the good of others only because it is not their own. It furrows the face of beauty with crow's feet or unsoftened lines of care. It makes its victims hard-hearted, hard-faced, and quarrelsome in speech and conduct. It robs the heart of refining influences by taking away all means of culture. It puts intellect and taste on the treadmill in quest for bread. It makes the soul go on all-fours to furnish food for the body. It chains a man's nobility to his stomach, which goads him to desperation by its unappeased cravings. And through all this man sinks at best to the level of a rational brute.

We believe that it was a bitter trial to Jesus, who had to endure it but temporarily, not because his soul did not shudder at it, but because it was one among the many wretched conditions surrounding his mortal existence; and he bore it merely to show that if it could not be enjoyed it could be borne with patience, and it behooved him, the Captain of our salvation, to be perfect through his sufferings. No sadder exclamation ever dropped from his lips, drawn by his necessities, as if from an almost intolerable sense of dejection and debasement—"the birds of the air have nests (perches,) and the foxes have holes, but the Son of Man hath not where to lay his head." It was a bitter necessity that drew such a confession, and it needed all his divine meekness and patience to bear it. There is a heartless affectation in the flippant way many people talk about this thing. It is neither honest, intelligent nor heartful. Poverty is of itself a curse. It is true that divine grace can extract some good out of even curses, but the curses are not the blessings, but the grace. Poverty is often more the mother of temptation than wealth. It is often a teacher of lies, and of the cunning and abandonment of theft. It sends men often to the bottle, in the vain hope of finding in its fiery contents that unconsciousness which is a wretched substitute for the griping want.

Adversity will toughen the fibers of endurance, and bring a kind of grim patience. It will make our wills more determined and imperious, but it takes great grace to get out of it anything amiable, tender, loving and happy. The soul is not tortured into goodness. The frozen, ungenial earth, soon to be the sepulcher of earth's life and beauties, is not melted into drops, or its frozen hands so relaxed as to let go summer's blessings by the raging March winds, or the descent of stinging sleet, or the hoary breath of midnight frosts. No, no. It is the smiling face of the returning sun that does this. It is the kindly kisses of the south wind and the sunny teardrops of April clouds which make the earth repent of its coldness, and send its heartless ice away, leaping down the rivulets to hide in the ocean, or to obey the sun's commands to the slumbering forms of beauty and fragrance. Loose them and let them go.

Then, brethren, give up romancing about the blessings of poverty. This is as vain as to put life in a corpse by putting a wreath of flowers on its frozen head. Set yourselves to work with a will to relieve it. This is the way to let Christ live in you, by letting his love shine through you. Every church ought to begin Dorcas work. Every family ought to begin economy for the needy during the coming months of this awful winter. Economy to the rich, for Christ's sake, is as great a virtue as poverty unrelieved is a curse to the poor. What a grand opportunity distress affords for the growth of love in your souls, and what a school for pity in the hearts of your children.—Presbyterian.

The Ring-Finger.

The ring-finger, though the weakest in the hand, possesses its peculiar honor and dignity, as ladies will allow. Indeed it has been held to be typical of their sex. An old writer describes the human hand as representing the life of the universe. The thumb stands for the Deity, without which the whole hand is powerless. The forefinger is likened to the angelic creation, the middle finger to man, the ring-finger to woman, and the little finger to the animal kingdom. These similes, if not very felicitous, are sufficiently quaint. In many other ways the hand has been supposed to be emblematic. The symbolism has penetrated to the nursery. A nurse will make a child put its two palms together, knitting them by closing the two middle fingers. In this position the child is told to separate the two thumbs, which it does with ease, and thereupon is told that "brother and sister may part." It is next asked to separate the forefingers, which also it easily does, and is informed that "father and son may part." Then it is required to separate the two little fingers, and upon doing this is told that "mother and daughter may part." It is now told to try and separate the two ring-fingers. This, as the middle fingers are locked together, it cannot possibly do, and is thereupon told that "wife and husband cannot part." Many other instances might be given of the way in which the human hand is employed by children, large and small, to symbolize this thing and that. But our present purpose is to draw attention to a curious philological question in connection with the ring-finger. We prefer to call the finger between the middle and little fingers "the ring-finger," as that finger is now generally called the "third" finger; whereas, counting the thumb as a finger, it used to be called—and notably is now called in the Book of Common Prayer—the "fourth" finger.—Littell's Living Age.

EGYPTIAN MAXIMS.—Rev. Dr. J. P. Thompson, in his "Notes on Egyptology," in the Bibliotheca Sacra, gives the following maxims from the ancient Egyptians:

"Do not take on airs.

"Do not maltreat an inferior. Respect the aged.

"Do not save thy life at the expense of another's.

"Do not pervert the heart of thy comrade if it is pure.

"Do not make sport of those who are dependent upon thee.

"Do not maltreat a woman whose strength is less than thine own. Let her find in thee a protector.

"If from an humble condition thou hast become powerful, and the first in the city of opulence, let not riches make thee proud, for the first Author of these good things is God.

"If thou art intelligent, bring up thy son in the love of God. If he is courageous and active, and increases thy property, give him a better recompense. But if thou son whom thou hast begotten is a fool, do not turn thy heart away from him, for he is thy son."

AN INTOLERABLE BORE having talked a friend nearly out of his senses, finally struck out on the "oyster," which he called "one of the most remarkable specimens of creative wisdom extant;" when his friend interrupted him, and "closed the debate" with the exclamation: "The oyster! Ah, yes, the oyster is a glorious fellow! He always knows when to shut up!"

The Christian Advocate.

THURSDAY, MARCH 18, 1875.

A CURIOUS EPITAPH.

(From the burying ground of Concord, Massachusetts.)

God wills us free—man wills us slaves.
I will as God wills; God's will be done.
Here lies the body of John Jack,
A native of Africa, who died
March, 1773 aged about sixty years.
Though born in a land of slavery,
He was born free;
Though he lived in a land of liberty,
He lived a slave;
Till by his honest though stolen labors
He acquired the source of slavery,
Which gave him his freedom;
Though not long before
Death, the great tyrant,
Gave him his final emancipation,
And put him on a footing with kings.
Though a slave to vice,
He practiced those virtues
Without which kings are but slaves.

The Family and the Home.

The home exists for the family, as the bird's nest for the birdlings that are to come into it in due time, and be brooded over and fed by loving parents, and taught to fly when finally they are fledged. And the home has little meaning and less beauty when there are no living jewels to shine like diamonds in its setting of love and care.

There is no slight reason for alarm and outcry when we find the customs and tendencies of society such that marriage becomes an extravagance or an impossibility to young men and women who would gladly conform to the laws of nature, and set themselves together in families. It is no small thing that the instincts which make the birth and rearing of children the richest blessing of the family are being cruelly sacrificed—sacrificed by predetermination and selfish forethought, that children may not bring into the household the burdens and cares that attend them. When the desire of pleasure, gain or leisure excludes children from the family, the idea of what constitutes a household has been sadly debased. When society imposes such a necessity against the instinct and will of the young it has become a hard despotism. By and by outraged affections, and starved desires will break out in rebellion, and then society shall repay sorrow and anxiety for every pleasure it pilfered at the expense of the home.

They who willingly exclude children from the household, and expect to enjoy life without their innocent prattle and the cares of the family, reap no benefit from marriage. Their lives become more loveless and desolate than they would be if circumstances had forced them to singleness and solitude; for affections do not die until they are bruised and outraged. The pleasures of home are not the fruit of dwarfed instincts. Nor do other delights compensate; for the secret of enjoyment is gone when the generous trust in nature is lost and the cares of the family are despised. A childless home is a misfortune, to be endured when it cannot be avoided, but to be avoided whenever it is possible; for all that is childlike in human nature, all that keeps human beings young forever, is nurtured and preserved by contact with children, and the affections they call into play.

Young people think they will have all the pleasures of a home without its cares. They will drink the delights of married life and dodge its responsibilities. They will pluck no child-fruit from the tree of life; for a baby is a tribulation, and a teething, drooling young one is a vexation. And they were just such tribulations and vexations once! The rose is always set in a necklace of thorns. The care to-day is the price of comfort to-morrow. Responsibilities are the other side of privileges. Blessings come to us in a wrappage of duties. The joy and pride of parents in children, well trained and nurtured, more than repay a hundred times all the trials and self-denial incident to infancy. The satisfaction they bring to parents in middle life is unspeakable. And then, when the feet falter, and the limbs grow weak, and the eye loses its luster, there is no staff on earth so supporting and full of comfort as the sustaining love and care of a child reared in an atmosphere of love and trained to veneration.

Snail Culture in France.

Frogs, horses and snails—the first are an odd but toothsome dainty, which epicures, in this country as well as elsewhere, dearly prize; but horses, and especially snails—these are articles of diet which the enlightened American republic has yet to be educated to relish. Hippophagy is as common in Paris, or nearly so, as the eating of beef; and the worn-out steed finds his way to the abattoir as readily as the milkless cow or stall-fed ox. Hence, as a mere bonne bouche, he has pulled on the Gallic taste, educated by swollen geese livers or decayed salmon roes; a new dainty has been sought for, found, and the basis of the new industry which the production has developed is snails. There is nothing peculiar about the mollusk. It is the every-day slimy little object of which one finds thousands in gardens, vineyards and woods. Switzerland and the provinces of Burgundy and Provence are the places of its cultivation. Throngs of women and children scour the country, collecting the snails in immense numbers, and depositing them in little tracts of land, inclosed with simply a trail of sawdust. This last the snail despises; he cannot cross it, and avoids its vicinity as a matter of preference. Therefore for his confinement it is as good as a stone wall. After incarceration for two or three days he is permitted to starve, and then the plot is laid out in patches of turf intersected by paths of sand. Above boards are hung to serve as shelter for the snails, which instinctively gather in large groups. The food provided consists in aromatic plants, such as mint, or lettuce and fragments of vegetables. This is fed to them three times a day in enormous quantities. At the end of eight days the snails become quite obese, and, besides, have attained a very succulent flavor. Then comes another period of starvation for several days, after which transmission to market follows.

Gourmands, it is said, prefer the snail when taken wild, so long as the capture is made at a particular period. After the eggs are laid in May the mollusks conceal themselves under stones to avoid the autumn frosts. There they become perfectly free from excretions, and, drawing themselves into their shells, close up for the winter. It is when they are collected in this state that their flavor is said to be best.—Scientific American.

Birds and Icicles.

Strange companions are birds and icicles, and rare cotemporaries in the garden, but both are now there; the birds on a flowering shrub bereft of leaves and blossoms, and the icicles pendent on the bare twigs and tendrils of a wisteria vine. The birds chirp and twitter, and the icicles glitter and sparkle. The brown snow birds in white vests flutter around, and fly from one leafless tree to another. The icicles only hang transparent and fairy-like as crystal eardrops on the many lobes of the vine. The last year's nest is far up among the branches, where in early summer the songsters loved to dwell and sip honey from the purple flowers, but now utterly forsaken. The snow birds do not visit it, and the winter's wind, with its frigid breath, congeals still harder its icy decorations.

These icicle clusters on the wisteria are as novel as they are beautiful, and brilliant as flashing diamonds, reflecting the morning sunshine or the pale light of the full moon. But the birds, thoughtless creatures, care no more for moonlight or shining icicles than they do for senatorial contests or the latest news by telegraph. They are a jolly set of well-to-do chirpers, and look as comfortable and careless as possible. Their coats of brown feathers and vests of white down vie in warmth and elegance with seal-skin sacques and Ulster overcoats.

We do wonder, however, where they tarry these cold nights, and conjecture whether they stand on one foot, with each tiny head under a soft wing, and long for a rosy glow in the east. And does the "bread and butter" question agitate their bird hearts by day? And do they watch the melting icicles on the southern side to catch a drop of water to moisten their pretty throats? But we may admire these winter visitors without pity when we remember that not a sparrow falleth without the notice of the great Father, and enjoy undisturbed this pleasant reminder of balmy air, of arbutus, and all the fresh verdure of spring's resurrection.—Providence Journal.

A Scene of Patient Sorrow.

In the town of Scranton, Pennsylvania, where the mills and furnaces this winter are either stopped or run upon half time, many miners and laborers are out of work, and their families suffer, as thousands of the poor do this season from a similar cause. One who visited Scranton late last fall, and saw the destitution in the miners' homes, speaks of wives and mothers cursing the names of the employers, and rebelling revengefully against their fate. As a moving contrast to these, he describes one humble dwelling where he found a calmer and more Christain grief.

Poverty was here, and want and woe; but it seemed as if the hand, daily and hourly losing its strength, was daily and hourly giving that strength to keep it warm and clean. The fire that burned was faint and flickering, and the room was miserable and mean; but the presence of a mother, and the pure, white face of her child, wrought up a picture which, despite its dreary coloring and terrible background, was as sweet and touching as it was painful and sad.

There was no defiance on the tender countenance of that poor woman by the fire; it was upturned to ours as we entered, and we learned of its misery through its tears. Poverty had destroyed her comfort, her happiness, her home; but poverty had not robbed her of her womanhood. It was there as a bright and holy spark, burning still in the midst of her despair.

She was not altogether destitute, nor was the house entirely without food. But she said, faintly raising her thin hand and pointed finger, as if the terrible thing existed to her vision in tangible form:

"The winter! the winter!"

"Have you any other children save that little one?" I asked.

Without a word the woman tiredly arose, and, taking up the lamp, walked into an adjoining room. I followed her. There was a bed standing in the corner—a bed that was old, but clean. She pulled down the covering gently, as if not to disturb the sleeper, and disclosed the face of a little girl.

For several moments there was no sound, but I knew, as she looked upon the face of her slumbering darling, she thought of the cold, freezing winter yet to come. Her feelings were too strong for her to resist, the lamp shook like an aspen leaf in her hand and she burst into tears.—New York Herald.

WE READ the other day of an Irish Catholic servant, late from the bogs, who serves in a Protestant family in New York, starting out one Sabbath morning in search of her church, and, though well directed by her mistress, losing her way, and stumbling into the High Episcopal St. Alban's, where she felt very much at home, performing her devotions according to true Irish style. Returning to her mistress in great composure, she was asked if she had found her church, and replied: "Yes, ma'am." "What is the name of it, Bridget?" "It's the holy church of St. Alban's, ma'am." "And did it seem like home to you, Bridget?" "I could see nothing wrong, ma'am, except there were no holy water, ma'am."

A Bargain With the Pump.

It is a queer place to make a bargain, truly; but there is many a harder customer for a thirsty man to deal with than our honest friend, the pump, as the following story will show:

A hard-working weaver had saved a guinea for the express purpose of having what he called a week's fuddle. He began on Monday, spending three shillings per day for seven days. On the morning of the eighth day he was burning with thirst, but his money was gone. He went to the back door of the beer shop, where he had spent every farthing of his guinea, to beg a pint on trust. The landlady was mopping the passage. He stood looking at her, with his cracked lips, parched tongue and bloodshot eyes, expecting her to ask him to take just a drop; but she did not, and he requested her to trust him for only one pint.

With an indignant look she replied: "Trust you? Set a step in this house and I will dash this mop in your face."

The poor man hung down his head in shame. He was leaning against the pump, and after a little study began to talk to it.

"Well, Pump," he said, "I have not spent a guinea with thee; wilt thou trust me a drop?"

He lifted up the handle, put his burning mouth to the spout and drank. This done, he again said to the pump:

"Thank thee, Pump; and now hear me, Pump. By God's help I will not enter a public house again for the next seven years; and, Pump, thou art a witness."

The bargain was kept, and this man afterward became a respectable manufacturer, and often said it was a grand thing for him that the landlady threatened to dash the mop in his face.

Are there not many poor fellows who would do well to stop trading at the bar and try a bargain with the pump?—The Morning.

Longevity of Birds.

Among the feathered creation the eagle and raven, the swan and parrot, are each centenarians. An eagle kept in Vienna died after a confinement of one hundred and fourteen years, and on an ancient oak in Sheiborne, still known as the "raven tree," the same pair of ravens are believed to have fixed their residence for a series of more than ninety years. Swans upon the River Thames, about whose age there can be no mistake, since they are annually nicked by the Vintners' Company, under whose keeping they have been for five centuries, have been known to survive one hundred and fifty years and more. The melody of the dying swan is entirely mythological. Upon approach of death the bird quits the water, sits down upon the banks, lays its head upon the ground, expands its wings a trifle and expires, uttering no sound.

The extreme longevity of the parrot is equally authentic. In the Zoological Gardens of London there is a macaw that was admitted to the tower in the year 1764. At Versailles, during the reign of Charles the Tenth, there was always hanging a cage in the Œil de Bœuf which contained a parrot purchased by the Regent Orleans for the Duchess de Berri. There is not a collection of birds in any of the royal aviaries of Europe that has not its ancient parrot. The writer purchased a gray African parrot in 1856, whose residence in Wales was authenticated for seventy-seven years. The bird, more wonderful for variety of speech than for her age, learning everything and forgetting nothing, accomplished alike in the Welsh tongue and the English, born in Africa, living more than three-quarters of a century in Europe, and dying in America, might have been alive now but for heedlessness. In 1867 she had certainly approached, if she had not reached and passed, her one hundredth year. Upon a severely cold night in December of that year she was sent from New York to Washington, and perished by the way. She was in perfect health, and had never known a day of sickness, showed no decrepitude, enjoyed life to the utmost, demanded no allowances or concessions on the score of advanced years, and might but for an exposure to the rigor of an unaccustomed climate have been alive today.—Boston Transcript.

HIGH PLACES.—The highest spot on the globe inhabited by human beings is the Buddhist cloister of Hanle, in Thibet, where twenty-one priests live at an altitude of 16,000 feet. The monks of St. Bernard, whose monastery is 8,117 feet high, are obliged to descend frequently to the valleys below in order to obtain relief from the asthma induced by the rarity of the atmosphere about their mountain eyrie. At the end of ten years' service in the monastery they are compelled to change their exalted abode for a permanent residence at the ordinary level. When the brothers Schlaginsweil explored the glaciers of the Ibi Gamin, in Thibet, they once encamped at 21,000 feet, the highest altitude at which a European ever passed the night. At the top of Mont Blanc, 15,781 feet above the level of the sea, Prof. Tyndall spent a night, and with less comfort than his guide, who found it very unpleasant. In July, 1872, Mr. Glaisher and Mr. Coxwell ascended in a balloon to the enormous height of 38,600 feet. Before starting Mr. Glaisher's pulse beat 76 strokes per minute, and Mr. Coxwell's 74. At 17,000 feet Mr. Glaisher's pulse had increased to 84, and Mr. Coxwell's to 100. At 19,000 the hands and lips of the aeronauts turned quite blue. At 26,000 feet Mr. Glaisher could hear his heart beat, and his breathing became oppressed. At 28,000 he became senseless; notwithstanding which he still ascended another 9,000 feet, when his hands were paralyzed and he had to open the valve with his teeth. In the Alps, at the height of 13,000 feet, climbers suffer from the rarity of the air; yet in the Andes persons can dwell, as at Potosi, at a height of from 13,000 to 15,000 feet without inconvenience.

PAY POSTAGE.—Subscribers whose subscriptions have been paid at the old rates—viz.: two dollars per year—and whose subscriptions run into 1875, are required under the new postage law, which goes into effect January 1, to pay postage at the office of mailing. The subscription price hereafter includes the postage. Two cents per month each month that the subscription has to run, will be sufficient to pay for the ADVOCATE.

RISKS ON REMITTANCES.—Money may be sent to the publisher of the ADVOCATE in payment of subscriptions, in amounts not exceeding ten dollars, by registered letter, at his risk. Any amounts may be sent by express or postoffice money order at his risk, provided that in all the above cases the expense of remitting be borne by the person who remits. Otherwise it will be at their own risk.

THE GREAT JACKSON ROUTE.—The New Orleans, St. Louis and Chicago railway was never in better condition than at present to forward passengers and freight to all points North, East and West. The track from Kenner to Manchac has been raised, and the floods have not affected the road-bed in any way. The route makes close connections with all the trunk routes to New York with only one change, either by the way of Louisville, Chicago, St. Louis, Odin and Effingham. Two daily through trains, with the celebrated Pullman sleeping coaches attached to each train.

SPRING OPENING.—Mme. M. Lahnstein, No. 603 Magazine street, informs her lady friends and customers, through the advertising columns of the ADVOCATE, that she has just received a large and elegant stock of the latest millinery goods. Mrs. Lahnstein is a lady of taste, which she displayed to great advantage in the selection of her stock.

BOOTS AND SHOES.—Mr. Louis Gimbel, agent, at 578 Magazine street, has one of the finest assortments of hats, boots and shoes in the city, and at prices that will suit any one. Send for his card of measurement, by which any one can take his own measure and send on his order.

FOR tea and coffee we would advise our friends to go to 5 Camp street, where Mr. J. J. Martin has the choicest brands for sale. Orders from the country promptly filled, and packages sent by express C. O. D. His advertisement and scale of prices will be seen elsewhere.

SHOES.—The Blue Store, at the corner of Orleans and Claiborne streets, proposes to sell shoes on terms that should attract the attention of customers. See in our advertising columns what is said by A. Durlen, the proprietor, and give him a call.

DRESSMAKING AND MILLINERY.—Mrs. F. Pilster, at 539 Magazine street, offers her customers moderate terms, and assures promptness and satisfaction. She invites country orders. See her card in our advertising columns.

DR. LEFFINGWELL, whose Institute and Dispensary is at 230 Canal street, has recently cured successfully long-standing cases of catarrh. See advertisement and give him a call.

DR. WARRINGTON'S advertisement will be seen on another page.

SHORT LINE TO THE NORTHERN CITIES.—Persons going North or East by rail will do well to consult the advantages of the Louisville, Cincinnati and Lexington railroad, passing from Louisville through one of the finest portions of Kentucky. The towns of LaGrange, Lexington, Worthville, Sparta, Verona and Covington lie on the route. Besides the comforts afforded by a good road and polite attention, the beauties of the blue grass region and highly improved estates along the line are not to be ignored by travelers of appreciative taste. All necessary information can be obtained from S. S. Parker, Esq., general passenger and ticket agent, Louisville, who is a courteous and cultivated gentleman.

DIRECT LINE OF STEAMERS TO FRANCE.—The General Trans-Atlantic Company's mail steamships, leaving New York for Havre every Saturday, afford an excellent opportunity for those who wish to sail for France by the most direct and pleasant route. There is time and money saved and perils avoided by taking this route. Let all who have an idea of visiting the Continent read the advertisement and consult Mr. L. Grand, the polite and attentive agent, at room 11, Gaillier Court, Carondelet street, New Orleans.

WE TAKE pleasure in calling the attention of our readers, and especially those who need machinery, to the advertisement of Messrs. Poole & Hunt, the widely-known founders and machinists of Baltimore, Maryland. These gentlemen have an exceptionally large and well-equipped establishment, supplied with the latest and most approved tools and appliances, and are at all times prepared to promptly fill orders in their line. Furthermore, they guarantee fair prices, the best of materials and first-class work.

SPORTSMEN'S DEPOT.—Every person who expects to provide himself with an outfit for hunting or fishing should visit the depot, at 55 St. Charles street, where the finest assortment of fishing tackle and sporting materials are offered at the most reasonable prices. See advertisement and look through assortment, and examine prices before purchasing.

ICE.—Our city and country readers who expect to use ice during the approaching spring and summer will do well to give attention to the advertisement of J. R. Warner, 31 Front street, importer of Maine ice. Retail dealers supplied, and strict attention given to packing and shipping to those ordering from the country.

GREGG'S PURCHASING BUREAU.—Parties in the country, and especially ladies, who may wish purchases made here would consult their own interest by sending their orders to the above agency. Mrs. Ada Gregg devotes her attention to the selections. Sewing machines for sale. See advertisement.

CROWN OF LIFE, the new song-book for the Sunday school, by W. A. Ogden, author of "New Silver Song," and other popular works which have met with such unprecedented sale, is advertised in another column. Send to W. W. Whitney, Toledo, Ohio, for specimen pages.

SAFETY OIL.—Reduction in Price. Mr. T. Sewell, at No. 60 Camp and 95 Dauphine street, is preparing for shutting off the gas by having on hand an abundant supply of the People's Safety Oil, and has reduced the price from sixty to fifty cents per gallon.

SHOES AND BOOTS.—Our old friend, George John Wagner, has lost none of his former reputation in the above line of business, and we can advise those in search of good articles to give him a call.

SPRING OPENING.—Mrs. Hardou, No. 29 Chartres street, opened her fresh stock of goods yesterday, consisting of spring styles and fresh goods. See advertisement elsewhere.

FROM a reliable source we learn that information of great value to every family is sent free by addressing, for circular, F. W. Brown 177 West Fourth street, Cincinnati.

News of the Week.

DOMESTIC.

LOUISVILLE, March 17.—During the last two weeks several outrages by masked men have been reported from Todd county, Kentucky. Last week a man named Brothers made a confession implicating a number of men as being connected with the Ku-klux organization.

Warrants were issued for their arrest, and all are now in the county jail except one, and the officers are in pursuit of him. Some trouble was feared, and Governor Leslie to-day sent a company of militia from this county to Todd county. The Governor reiterates his determination to put a stop to this business.

NEW YORK, March 18.—The two weekly lines of steamers between this port and New Orleans, run by Mallory & Co. and A. Baker, have discontinued their trips, leaving only one regular line in the trade.

The agent of that line, when questioned as to the cause of the withdrawal of the other two, said it had been brought about by the great depression of trade by politics in Louisiana, and the fact that most of the cotton which formerly found its way to New York in transit for Liverpool is now shipped directly in steamers to Europe from New Orleans. New York is not the great receiving port for cotton that it used to be.

As things stand at present, there is not work for more than one steamship line. Sailing ships have cut up the trade. Freights are low, and should matters not take a more favorable turn steamships will not succeed in making more than running expenses. The steamship trade to Savannah has of late decreased to half its former extent.

MEMPHIS, March 19.—The Common Council last evening appointed a committee to solicit aid for the sufferers by the tornado at Rienzi, Mississippi.

The latest accounts represent that great distress prevails there among those left homeless, and the damage is estimated at $150,000.

AUGUSTA, March 20.—A fearfully destructive tornado passed over here this afternoon. This city, being situated in a basin, was protected by the surrounding hills from the fury of the storm. A rainfall, accompanied by hail, was unprecedentedly heavy. Several towns in the interior suffered severely in loss of life and property. At Cammack, on the Georgia railroad, several houses were blown down. Thomas Geesling was killed and several persons wounded.

Near Thompson, forty miles from Augusta, a large amount of property was destroyed and several persons killed.

At Appling, in Columbia county, the destruction of property is reported to be great. Several persons are reported killed and many wounded.

At Aiken, South Carolina, the Catholic church was completely demolished.

All telegraph lines north are down but one, and reports from the country are confused and unsatisfactory as to the extent of the damage and number of lives lost; but there seems to be no doubt that the storm was fearfully destructive, surpassing in extent and violence anything of the kind in this section for years.

AUGUSTA, GEORGIA, March 21.—The tornado caused fearful destruction along its track, laying waste houses, fences and trees, and killing persons and stock. The Baptists were holding a meeting at Elam church, near Cammack, when the storm demolished it, killing three and wounding twenty-five persons. Residences and outhouses were demolished on many plantations in Warren, McDuffy and Columbia counties, in Georgia, the destruction extending into Edgefield, Aiken and Barnwell counties, in South Carolina. In some places persons were blown a distance of sixty yards. Every house on Mrs. P. E. Walton's plantation, including a fine residence, was destroyed. In Columbia county three negroes were killed and twenty-five persons wounded. Ten houses on Dr. Hamilton's place were destroyed. It is impossible to give a correct idea of the amount of property destroyed. $100,000 will not cover it. Fearful suffering is already reported in the devastated territory. Nothing like so destructive a storm was ever known in this section.

WASHINGTON, March 22.—Every seat is occupied and a thousand persons surging through the galleries to hear Andrew Johnson. After eleven o'clock ingress was impossible. The diplomatic gallery is well filled. The Senate floor proper is crowded with privileged outsiders.

Senator Johnson was dressed in his usual style of elegant neatness. He has a full suit of gray hair. His voice at first was low, but gradually swelled until it rang through the corridors. He spoke without notes. He was loudly applauded when he said: "If Grant is elected a third time, then good-by to the republic." He spoke two hours. There was much applause from the galleries, and many congratulations from his friends on the floor.

Mr. Johnson spoke at length of the traditions of the republic. Henry Clay introduced a resolution denouncing President Jackson for removing deposits. It was then decided the Senate had no right to pass upon the action of the President, unless sitting as a court of impeachment; alluded to the troubles in Tennessee in 1866, when resignations defeated a quorum; General Thomas was instructed strictly to abstain from any interference. This dispatch was written by the Secretary of War in the presence of the President. He declared it was not his intention to give utterance to a single personal matter, but to speak of public acts.

He then referred to the removal of Sheridan from the command of the fifth military district in 1867. It was in consequence of the wall which came up from the people of that section. Why was it Sheridan was selected to be sent back to these people who before condemned him and prayed for his removal? He (Johnson) knew the determination of the people of the South. Their great object was to be restored to the Union.

Referring to the action of President Grant toward Louisiana, he would say to this Emperor what Cato said to the embassador of Cæsar: "Let him disband his legions and restore the commonwealth to liberty." Let him do that, and he (Johnson,) humble as he was, would mount the rostrum and strive to have an indignant people forgive him for his violation of law.

AUGUSTA, March 23.—Eight counties in Georgia and three in South Carolina need relief from the effects of the tornado. The list of killed and wounded is appalling.

FOREIGN.

LONDON, March 18.—The failure of the General South American Banking Company is announced. The liabilities are estimated at $1,500,000.

LONDON, March 20.—John Mitchel is dead. He died quietly, this morning at eight o'clock, at Dromolane, Ireland.

LONDON, March 21.—Moody and Sankey preached in the morning, afternoon and evening at Agricultural Hall. At the three meetings the audiences numbered respectively 16,000, 14,000 and 19,000.

There was some confusion in consequence of the vast crowds in and around the hall, especially in the evening.

The Storm at Rienzi.

MEAGER PARTICULARS.

RIENZI, MISS., March 14, 1875.

The little town of Rienzi has been visited with a sore calamity. On Sunday night about one o'clock the terrible storm commenced; such flashes of lightning and peals of thunder are not often witnessed or heard. Houses either leveled to the earth or unroofed, leaving the dying and the dead exposed to the fury of the storm, was the result.

Out of town the following houses were blown down: that of Jordon Reece, Mrs. Palmer, Dr. Bynum, Judge Arnolds, W. M. Ebrous, J. M. Martins, Henry Johnson, William Ross, Posey Martin, M. B. Armoens, Edward Hoskell and Dr. Stevens.

Killed.—Jordon Reece and his little daughter, Mrs. Palmer's daughter, and Porter Walker, of Baldwyn.

Wounded.—Mrs. Palmer, Mrs. Judge Arnold, Henry Johnson, M. B. Armour (badly.) Mrs. Armour (two limbs broken.) some slight wounds in Edward Hoskell's family.

Everything is waste and ruin in the higher part of the town; fences and stables are all gone; the streets are strewed with the wrecks of buildings, gardens, fences and lumber yards. Many are homeless, but those who escaped have kindly opened their doors and received them. It will be long before the damage is repaired.

The lower or business part of the town escaped, except in one or two instances the tops of chimneys were blown off and some other slight damage. I forgot to name Mr. Gordon, whose houses are leveled. No one wounded.

At Mr. Stevens' five ladies had retired when the crash came, and but for some large trees back of the house, on which the building fell, they might have all been killed.

We fear other casualties in the country may have occurred, if in the range of the storm.—Correspondent of Jackson Clarion.

ANNIVERSARY EXERCISES OF THE SCANDINAVIAN SEAMEN'S FRIEND SOCIETY.—The public exercises in connection with the first anniversary of the Scandinavian Seamen's Friend Society will take place at the Presbyterian church, on Lafayette Square, on Sunday evening next. Addresses are expected from Rev. Dr. Palmer, Hon. H. N. Ogden and others. The public generally, and especially those interested in the work of saving the multitudes of seamen, of all nationalities, that yearly come to this port from the myriad temptations that assail them, are cordially invited to be present.

University of Louisiana.

MEDICAL DEPARTMENT.

The assemblage which gathered in St. Patrick's Hall yesterday noon to witness the interesting ceremonies attendant upon the graduation of the students in the Medical Department of the Louisiana University was very select, and quite large in regard to numbers. The importance of the occasion was deeply impressed upon the minds of all present, and throughout the exercises the audience was extremely attentive.

About half-past twelve the faculty entered the hall and gravely assumed their places on the stage, Hon. Randell Hunt, who was invited to confer the degrees upon the students, presiding.

Order of Exercises.—Music—The Silver Trumpet. Conferring of degrees by Randell Hunt, LL. D. Music—Aria from Norma. Address to the class by Prof. S. M. Bemiss, M. D. Music—Fantasia.

Intermission.—Music—Pot Pourri from Huguenots. Valedictory—Albert B. Miles, M. D. Music—Life Enjoyment Galop.

When the opening music had ceased Hon. Randell Hunt addressed the alumni as follows:

"Gentlemen: I congratulate you on the completion of your collegiate course, and bid you welcome and God-speed on entering upon the practice of your profession as the commissioned sons of science. Yours is truly a divine mission—to minister to the ills and sufferings of the body, and to the afflictions and distresses of the mind, to remove or assuage pain, and to advise, comfort, and not unfrequently to point out the path of duty to your fellow man as creatures of reason, sensibility and immortal destiny. It is a mission that calls into action the noblest faculties of the mind and the cardinal virtues of the heart.

"Medicine, like all the kindred sciences, is of a progressive character. By adding to its improvement by your labor you will honorably discharge your professional duty, and promote the welfare and happiness of mankind. Gentlemen, remember your alma mater! Endeavor to advance her high fame higher and higher. May God shower his blessings upon you, and crown your labors with success and distinction."

The address to the class by Prof. S. M. Bemiss was remarkably fine, and contained an instructive description of the duties of a physician, and the domain of his professional exertions. It abounded in sound advice to those who were about to enter upon a career of usefulness, and whose labor would be in the interests of humanity. The valedictory of Mr. Albert Miles was a very able effort, and his impressive and elegant delivery enhanced the beauties of the oration. His speech was listened to with deep attention by his classmates, and loudly applauded by the audience.

Graduates in Medicine.—S. W. Applewhite, Texas; Charles W. Ball, Louisiana; William R. Barkley, Texas; Robert A. Bayley, Louisiana; J. M. Benton, Mississippi; G. P. Blundell, Mississippi; J. W. Bostick, Texas; F. M. Brooks, Louisiana; W. H. Carson, Louisiana; R. H. Dean, Mississippi; C. J. Ducôte, Louisiana; L. d'Estrampes, Cuba; John B. Fears, Texas; J. A. Fields, Texas; Z. T. Wilcox, Louisiana; N. W. Williams, Mississippi; Thomas E. Williams, Mississippi.

Graduates in Pharmacy.—H. Paulsen, L. Duringer.

After the delivery of the diplomas by Dr. T. G. Richardson, dean of the faculty, the audience dispersed, much pleased with the literary entertainment.—Picayune, March 20.

ON FRIDAY last the country near Smithland, on the Ouachita river, between Lone Grave and Ray's Point, was visited by a tornado, which for terrible ferocity has no parallel in the history of the State.

Previous to the tornado the heavens over the region of the country mentioned presented a lowering appearance, and gave every indication of a terrific storm, though nothing like what followed was anticipated. A large black cloud, from which emitted lightning, crossed over the face of the heavens, and simultaneously came a lumbering noise, as that of an earthquake, which set the whole country in terror and confusion. The people now apprehended a mighty storm and busied themselves in precautions for personal safety, and the horses, cows and mules fled indiscriminately like stricken things.

The storm soon came, and tore a passage through the pine-tree forest, levelling not only every tree in its course, but tearing up the little shrubs and bushes that beset its way.

All the buildings, the fences and cattle at Ray's Point were scattered all over the country, and Smithland was razed to the ground. The tornado cleared the forest near Ray's Point to a width of perhaps more than three hundred yards, and ran to a distance of fifteen miles below Smithland, west of the Ouachita river, and, rushing into the swamps, was there lost.

The destruction committed is conceived to be terrible, but its actual extent is as yet unknown. Dead animals lay miles away from the path of the tornado, and the only evidences of previous human habitations in the line of its march were things scattered along the ground and on the tree-tops.

Three persons are known to have been killed—Mrs. James Adair and two children. The loss of life is expected to be much larger, and the loss of property appalling, but the extent is as yet unknown.—New Orleans Picayune, March 23.

A Moderate Calf.

MR. EDITOR: Will you please publish the following notice and call:

Grove Street mission, in the city of Vicksburg, is under the control of the Methodist Episcopal Church South. This mission church was formed at the suggestion of one of our Bishops and the pastor of the Crofford Street Methodist Episcopal Church South, believing it to be a necessity in this place. This mission will reach many a precious soul that cannot be reached through the other churches of this city.

The few members who formed this mission three years ago have tried to complete a plain house of worship, where they might hold a mission Sunday school and divine service. The building is complete, but there is a debt of $1,000 hanging over it. If this debt could be paid the mission in one more year could be made self-sustaining, and would soon contribute more money to the cause of missions than is necessary to pay this debt.

We urge all persons who read the NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE to send us at once the sum of ten cents. This is a small sum, and yet large enough to save a struggling mission and make it a self-sustaining church. Do not throw this paper aside till you have your consent to send the ten cents. This is your best opportunity perhaps to do something for Jesus and the perishing poor. Forward your contributions to the Rev. Josias Bancroft or to

THE REV. DANIEL DUNCAN.—We were told the other day of the sad accident, says the Nashville Christian Advocate of March 20, which happened to our old friend, the Rev. Daniel Duncan, presiding elder of the Talladega district, North Alabama Conference. He was thrown from his buggy and much injured. We are glad to learn that he is recovering from his injuries. We hope the burning spirit which is in him will not force him out into the field of action until he is sound and well. He is getting along in years, but young in feeling, and we want to get a good deal of hard work out of him yet. Thank the Lord that his life was spared! The Rev. J. H. Anderson writes us, Talladega, March 9:

"The Rev. Daniel Duncan, presiding elder of this district, was thrown from his buggy on the first day of last month, dragged on the ground for several feet, and wounded very severely by a rail-point piercing his back, which affliction has confined him to his home ever since, but he is recovering very rapidly, and will soon resume duty on the district. Several of his friends have advised him to wait several weeks yet before he undertakes such responsibilities, but his heart is wholly in the work, and his feet would fain follow. Bro. Duncan is old only in years—he is young in vitality, in activity, in faithfulness. He is very anxious 'to be up and doing,' and that his friends, particularly on the district, should know of his rapid recovery."

Sunday School Celebration.

The twenty-ninth anniversary of the New Orleans District Sunday School Union of the Methodist Episcopal Church South will be celebrated on Sunday, the eleventh day of April, 1875, in the Carondelet Street church, commencing at four o'clock P. M. Addresses will be delivered by Rev. Bishop Paine, Rev. J. A. B. Ahrens and Rev. John Wilkinson. Music by the children, as usual.

On Saturday, the tenth of April, the schools will all meet at the same place and hour (four o'clock P. M., prompt) to practice their songs together.

New Orleans District Conference.

The New Orleans District Conference will meet at the Carondelet Street church, New Orleans, on Thursday, April 8, at five o'clock P. M. On Friday night, at half-past seven o'clock, there will be a district love-feast at the Carondelet Street church, to which all the Methodists of the district are earnestly invited. On Sunday afternoon, April 11, at three o'clock, the regular anniversary of the district Sunday schools will be held. Bishop Paine will be present and preside at the District Conference. J. B. AT THE GATE.

Thy kingdom here?
Lord, can it be?
Searching and seeking everywhere
For many a year.
"Thy kingdom come" has been my prayer:
Was that dear kingdom all the while so near?

Blinded and dull
With selfish sin,
Have I been sitting at the gates
Called Beautiful,
Where thy fair angel stands and waits
With hand upon the lock to let me in?

Was I the wall
Which barred the way,
Darkening the glory of thy grace,
Hiding the ray
Which, shining out as from thy very face,
Had shown to other men the perfect day?

Was I the bar
Which shut me out
From the full joyance which they taste
Whose spirits are Within thy paradise embraced—
Thy blessed paradise, which seemed so far?

The vision swells—
I seem to catch
Celestial breezes rustling low,
The palm-boughs
Where, singing softly ever to and fro,
Moves each fair saint who in thy presence dwells.

Let me no sit
Another hour
Idly awaiting what is mine to win,
Throned in wit,
Lord Jesus, rend these walls of self and sin;
Rent down the gate, that I may enter in.

The Confutation of a Supposed False Theory Confuted.

MR. EDITOR: Bro. Shanks, in his communication to the ADVOCATE, under the caption, "A False Theory," flatters himself that the false theory to which he alludes is shown to be unscriptural and absurd. I doubt not it appears so to him, but I seriously question whether his reasoning be as conclusive to others as it appears to be to my esteemed brother.

There seems to be a confusion of the logical terms, premise and conclusion in Bro. Shanks' statement of the question, as will be seen by the following quotation: "This theory is based upon the assumption that the Lord God created Adam neither good nor bad, neither holy nor unholy; and therefore Adam was not created holy." I think it would puzzle the most astute logician to discover any essential difference in the premise and conclusion of the above quotation. Adam was not created holy is what Bro. Shanks styles the conclusion; Adam was created neither holy nor unholy is, he tell us, the premise from which the conclusion is deduced. Bro. Shanks must see that these are identical propositions.

Bro. Shanks proceeds next to prove the falsity of the conclusion by showing up the absurdity of what he calls the premise; but as premise and conclusion are the same, he had just as well bestowed his pains on the latter as on the former. But let us see how he does his task. In order to make sure of victory he charges the advocates of the supposed false theory with maintaining that Adam had no "moral status" after his creation. I don't think that any one has ever said that. Those who oppose the doctrine of created holiness maintain that Adam's holiness was not concreated with him, for this would have been a necessary holiness, which is an absurdity. Adam was created with faculties and powers that were good; but holiness, if I mistake not, does not consist in the possession of unexerted powers and faculties, but in their active exercise in obedience to a known law. As these powers could not have been exercised by Adam till after his creation, it follows that he could not be a holy being, according to the above definition of holiness, till he acquired that character by an exercise of his powers in obedience to God's will.

It is incumbent on those who object to this conclusion to show some defect in the foregoing definition of holiness. If this cannot be done it is simply impossible to resist the conclusion that Adam's holiness was acquired at some time subsequent to his creation.

We do not say, as Bro. Shanks would make us, that after Adam was an active, thinking being he had no moral character; upon the contrary, the very first exercise of his powers in obedience to God's will constituted him a holy being; and that it was the exercise and not the possession of these powers that entitled him to that character. The absurdities Bro. Shanks tries to fasten upon what he is pleased to style "this false theory" do not attach to the theory when correctly stated. The question about which there has been a great deal of profitless discussion is this: Was Adam made a holy being by his Creator in the act of creation, or did he acquire that character after his creation? Those who will contend that Adam was made holy without his own agency, co-operation or consent, must take along with this all the absurd consequences of necessitated holiness. They stand or fall together.

Bro. Shanks charges upon ministers who indorse "the false theory" great inconsistency in urging people to be holy, since Adam lost for his posterity as well as for himself the character of holiness. The argument, if I understand it, is about this: Adam's holiness being acquired by his conformity to the divine will, when he lost this for himself and posterity holiness becomes an impossible attainment to human beings, because the powers by which it is acquired are lost in the fall; therefore it is inconsistent to urge people to be holy by the use of the gracious aid proffered in the gospel—that is to say, since you cannot make yourself holy by the use of natural means, it is absurd to urge upon people the use of gracious aids. I confess I don't see the inconsistency complained of. If I believed in a necessary holiness I should hesitate to urge people to become holy; but believing, as I do, that holiness depends upon the co-operation of the creature, I can consistently exhort men to avail themselves of the means ordained to that end. Bro. Shanks, and others who indorse his views, makes a distinction between the principle of holiness and its practice that is scarcely admissible. There cannot be holy principles separate and apart from holy practice. If these writers mean by holy principles the power to perform holy actions, I do not object; but if they mean (as I suppose they do) by holy principles that in which holiness consists, I protest against the discrimination. This amounts to an assumption of the question in dispute. If any of them were asked to show in what holy principles consist I apprehend a very lame and obscure explanation would follow. Would they say: Holy principles mean holy volitions, holy desires and holy affections? If so, could these exist before a holy practice? Well, if they do not mean internal exercises of some sort, by holy principles, will they tell us what they do mean? If they choose to express themselves clearly, they must mean by holy principles the power to perform holy actions; but we have already proved that holiness does not consist in the possession of good faculties, but in their holy exercise.

Scientific Materialism.

BY MRS. L. CRARY SADLER.

When Prof. Tyndall threw down the gauntlet to the Christian world, and dared them to test the power of prayer, and prove by actual answers that God did hear and answer prayer, we have no doubt he thought that the vexed question was finally disposed of, as he assumed his proposition to be unanswerable. But the Christian world, though a little startled, moved on—prayed on—is praying still. The ladder is still seen by the eye of faith. The rounds are firm and not worn out. The wings of ascending angels laden with the prayers of mortals, and the descending ones with answers and blessings, are never tired or folded.

In the new edition of Prof. Tyndall's Address on the True God and the God of Superstition is appended an article on Scientific Materialism, explanatory of what he had said about "matter having the promise and potency of all terrestrial life," etc., and of being accused by his critics of being a materialist and an atheist, in which he avows a sort of belief, as put forth in his address, of "a power inscrutable to the intellect of man, and which by searching no man can find out;" which is very true, but that does not prove that God does not care for us.

The professor, speaking of the overthrow of paganism, says: "As science demands the radical extirpation of caprice, and the absolute reliance upon law in nature, there grew with the growth of scientific notions a desire and determination to sweep from the field of theory this mob of gods and demons, and to place natural phenomena on a basis more congruent with themselves." And so, with this "absolute reliance upon law in nature," Prof. Tyndall and others of this school intend to sweep from the field of theory the idea of one God, who takes cognizance of us poor mortals—of a God who stoops to hear and answer prayer of the "God of superstition"—i. e., the God that Christians believe in and worship. And in his stead they give us—what? "Absolute law in nature."

The geologists say that the world was not made in six days; Darwin, that man developed from a monkey; and Tyndall, that God (if there is a God) is too great in his power and majesty to notice such an insignificant atom of creation as man; and they ridicule the idea of such a thing as Divine Providence having anything to do in the affairs of men. And this, we presume, is "scientific materialism." Prof. Tyndall says: "There is a deep set feeling which, since the earliest dawn of history, and probably for ages prior to all history, incorporated itself in the religions of the world. You who have escaped from these religions into the high and dry light of the intellect may deride them, but in so doing you deride accidents of form merely, and fail to touch the immovable basis of the religious sentiment in the nature of man. To yield this sentiment, reasonable satisfaction is the problem of problems at the present hour."

So in this "problem of problems" our religious feelings, which are so "deep-set," are to be tolerated to a limited degree, until we rise into the "high and dry light of the intellect." Then we will see and feel, in the elevated region of emotion, what we never saw and felt before.

Prof. Tyndall, with his scientific materialism, may mean well; Darwin and Huxley may mean well; but when they want the Christian to throw away his belief in a prayer-hearing and answering God, they must give him something better, which they have not yet been able to do. We believe in nature, we believe in science, and there is really no conflict between religion and science; but scientists should not deny and deride the Christian's belief. We hold that "the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things which are made."

"There is a book, who runs may read,
Which heavenly truth imparts;
And all the lore its scholars need—
Pure eyes and Christian hearts.

"The works of God, above, below,
Within us and around,
Are pages in that book, to show
How God himself is found."

"There have been too many proofs of God's love and mercy to man; too many triumphant death-bed scenes of our friends—glimpses within the "gates ajar;" too many heart-burnings within us of God's refreshing presence, for us to believe otherwise than that our heavenly Father careth for us. But that may be because we have not ascended "into the high and dry light of the intellect." If so, in blissful ignorance we confess that we prefer the light of the gospel of Jesus Christ, who said: "I am the light of the world. He that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life."

AS FOR ME, I will behold thy face in righteousness.—Psalms xvii, 15.

The good man knows and feels that God is ever present with him. His face is ever turned toward him, and the eyes of his blessed Father are ever upon him. "Thou, God, seest me," is a stern and solemn fact which he realizes every day, every hour, every moment. Hence his whole Christian life is one earnest and faithful effort to please God. Sometimes he quakes and fears when he sees his infirmities, imperfections and utter nothingness; but when he takes time for reflection, and calls to mind the great assurances of God's kindness, tenderness and love which are contained in the holy word, he is ready to find fault with himself for his needless fears and quakings. Then he joyfully moves on his upward way, and exults in the light of the countenance divine. With holy delight he can now cry out: "As for me, I will behold thy face in righteousness!"

"As for me!"—Others may do as they will, but this shall be my course, my great business in all my life—"I will behold thy face." While thou beholdest me I will behold thy face, I will recognize thy presence. If thou smilest I will behold and enjoy the blessed light of the smile; if thou frownest I will see it and know it means good for me!

"In righteousness!"—I will ever entertain right views of thy face—such views as the volume thou hast writ teaches; and in order to do this I will walk in the holy way of righteousness. From this blessed way—from my place in it—I will behold thy face, O my Father! Of course I cannot see thee with my eyes of flesh, but thou hast given me spiritual eyes—eyes of faith—with which I may "behold thy face in righteousness." With these new eyes I will always behold thee in everything. I will never lose sight of thee—of thy blessed face!

Then, O what a circumspect, consistent, upright, devoted and holy life I will lead in thy sight. I am still human—and that means a great deal—but thou art divine, and thou wilt be my sufficiency. Thy grace shall abound unto me, and by it I shall be fully qualified for all thy service upon the earth.

Behold me, then, O my Father! I love for thee to look upon me. I am not worthy that thou shouldest do this, but thou lovest me for thy own mercy's sake. Thou honorest me. I am exalted in that thou dost so condescend as to look upon me. Again, I am honored, exalted, because I am permitted and enabled to behold thy holy face in righteousness.

O my Father, I give thee glory!

The Province of Revelation.

In approaching the highest problems which occupy human thought—the origin, duty and destiny of man, and the existence and nature of God—revelation becomes fuller and clearer. The origin of intellect and conscience, with all their mysterious conceptions of law, obligation, a future state and a holy God, is embodied in one pregnant sentence: "So God created man in his own image." Here are revealed the essential personality and omnipotence of God; and as flowing from them the personality, knowledge, self-consciousness, moral feeling and immortality of man, who was made in the image of God. Of these sublime truths, in all their wondrous development, revelation becomes the complete and sole expounder; and every new phase of truth—whether of law, or morals, or worship, or faith, or love—finds such a responsive echo in our deepest feelings and loftiest aspirations that we instinctively bow before it as a message replete with the infinite wisdom of God. While science disappoints our most momentous inquiries, while philosophy leaves an aching void in the human heart, revelation fulfills all our wishes and satisfies all our hopes. By the testimony of some of the greatest men who have shed the luster of their genius upon the walks of science—Newton and Herschel, Guizot and Pritchard, Brewster and Chalmers—the Bible has been shown to be in full harmony with the facts of science. But it has a far higher claim upon our faith than scientific teaching can give it. It develops an ethical code purer and nobler than ever emanated from the schools of the world. It inspires man with a holy ardor, a self-denying, self-sacrificing love such as philosophers never dreamed of. It reveals to the eye of faith that other world after which our higher nature longs. It shows us that the consciousness of immortality, which haunts us here like a dream, is not a delusion, but a glorious reality. It enables us to look through the gloomy vista of this earth's labors and sorrows to another where labor shall have its full reward, and sorrow shall be unknown. It shows, away beyond the tomb, a life peaceful, happy, glorious, for which the life on earth, with its limitations and disappointments, its ceaseless struggles and unfulfilled desires, is only the school of preparation. It opens before us a sphere where the perfect knowledge after which we here vainly toil, and the perfect happiness after which we here as vainly strive, shall be fully and forever realized. There is nothing in science or philosophy like this. There is no power in them to make man so wise, so useful, so holy. There is no discovery of science which can bring life and immortality to light. There is no scientific agency which can conquer death, and throw wide the gates of paradise to the disembodied spirit. In breadth of true knowledge, in quickening, ennobling power, philosophy and science sink into complete insignificance before this grand revelation of God.—Prof. Porter's Lecture in Belfast.

THE sentimental sympathy which finds its beginning, enjoyment and end in a novel is as far from that sympathy which is awakened by a sensible knowledge of the hut of poverty and the house of mourning as a sickly wish is from a weeping, moving will.

ACCORDING to the Republican Francaise a German camp of maneuvers for one hundred and fifty thousand men is to be formed near Treves in the spring, under the Emperor's command.

A Sample of Mr. Moody's Preaching.

As a sample of Mr. Moody's preaching the London News gives the following:

His purpose was to make it clear that men were saved not by any action of their own, but simply by faith. This he illustrated, among other ways, by introducing a domestic scene from the life of the children of Israel, in the wilderness, at the time the brazen serpent was lifted up. The dramatis personæ were a young convert, a skeptic and the skeptic's mother. The convert, who has been bitten by the serpent, and having followed Moses' injunction, is cured, "comes along," and finds the skeptic lying down, "badly bitten." He entreats him to look upon the brazen serpent which Moses has lifted up, but the skeptic has no faith in the alleged cure, and refuses. "Do you think," he says, "I am going to be saved by looking at a brass serpent away off on a pole? No, no." "Well, I dunno," says the young convert, "but I was saved that way myself. Don't you think you'd better try it?" The skeptic refuses, and his mother "comes along," and observes: "Hail you not better look at it, my boy?" "Well, mother, the fact is that if I could understand the philosophy of it, I would look up right off; but I don't see how a brass serpent away off on a pole can cure me." And so he dies in his unbelief. It seemed odd to hear this conversation from the wilderness recited, word for word, in the American vernacular, and with a local coloring that suggested that both the skeptic and the young convert were tail-coats, and that the mother had to "come along" in a stiff dress. But when the preacher turned aside, and in a very few words spoke of sons who would not hear the counsel of Christian mothers, and refused to "look up and live," the silent tears that coursed down many a face in the congregation showed that his homely picture had been clear to the eyes before which it was held up.

THE WITCHERY OF MANNER.—Almost every man can recall scores of cases, within his knowledge, where pleasing manners have made the fortunes of lawyers, doctors, divines, merchants, and, in short, men in every walk of life. Raleigh flung down his laced coat into the mud for Elizabeth to walk on, and got for his reward a proud queen's favor. The politician who has this advantage easily distances all rival candidates, for every voter he speaks with becomes instantly his friend. The very tones in which he asks for a pinch are often more potent than the logic of a Webster or a Clay. Polished manners have often made scoundrels successful, while the best of men, by their hardness and coldness, have done themselves incalculable injury; the shell being so rough that the world could not believe there was precious kernel within. Civility is to a man what beauty is to a woman. It creates an instantaneous impression in his behalf, while the opposite quality excites as quick a prejudice against him. It is a real ornament, the most beautiful dress that man or woman can wear, and worth more as a means of winning favor than the finest clothes and jewels ever worn. The gruffest man loves to be appreciated; and it is oftener the sweet smile of a woman, which we think intended for us alone, than a pair of Juno-like eyes, or "lips that seem on roses fed," that bewitches our heart, and lays us low at the feet of her whom we afterward marry.—Home Guardian.

A HIGH-CHURCH Episcopal Bishop in England was very much opposed to any one praying without a book. As he was riding out on a certain day his horse took fright, ran away, broke the sulky and broke the Bishop's leg. The Bishop was in great pain and in fear of dying; and called for some one to pray with him. There was an honest Christian man, one John Rodgers, who lived near by, who was sent for; and as he saw the situation of the prelate he was deeply affected. The burden of his prayer was as follows: "Seeing you have taken the Bishop in hand to humble him, O Lord! make thorough work. If breaking one leg won't answer, O Lord! break t'other too."

Obituaries.

GEORGE D. MCCORMICK died, at his late residence in Jasper county, Mississippi, February 18, 1875.

At the Quarterly Conference of the Paulding circuit, Mississippi Conference, held February 27, 1875, the following preambles and resolutions were adopted:

Whereas, It has pleased almighty God to take from our midst our beloved brother, George D. McCormick; And whereas, He was a member of this body, a good and holy man, devoted to the church, and a most useful steward; therefore,

Resolved, That in the death of Bro. McCormick the church has lost one of its most devoted friends and efficient officers, and the country (east Mississippi) has lost one of its most respected and influential citizens.

Resolved, That, feeling deeply pained to lose the fellowship on earth of our deceased brother, we bow in meek submission to the will of God, believing that our loss is his eternal gain.

Resolved, That we tender to the family of the deceased our sympathy in their gloom and bereavement, and that a copy of these preambles and resolutions be sent to the family of the deceased, and also a copy to the NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE for publication.

Resolved, That this body appoint Rev. T. S. Newman to write out a biographical sketch of the life of our beloved brother, G. D. McCormick, and send it to the NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE for publication.

MRS. OLIVIA M. READY, daughter of Colonel James Hogan, formerly of Talladega, Alabama, was born in Claiborne county, Tennessee, August 16, 1821. She connected herself with the church when twelve years of age, and continued a devoted and consistent member until her death. She was married to Mr. Aaron Ready, of Wetumpka, on the twenty-ninth of September, 1846. After his death Mrs. Ready spent the most of the remainder of her life very usefully as a teacher. She taught two years at Bradford, Coosa county, three years at Talladega, fifteen years in Wetumpka, and two years in Selma, making in all twenty-two years in this vocation. During the year 1855-56 I was pleasantly associated with her in the Talmdega Female Institute, and I can bear testimony to her faithfulness and patience, her skill in imparting instruction and her intelligent appreciation of all the duties of her position. She had extraordinary tact for governing and teaching, and, having once established herself in the home she loved, no one could take her crown. Hence her long stay in Wetumpka. Mrs. Ready knew the power of example, and used that power with great effect. She was candid, independent, outspoken—had her own opinions and maintained them. She was a good neighbor, a model teacher, a generous and unwavering friend.

About two years ago she was attacked by cancer, which finally terminated her life. She suffered long and grievously; went with her daughter to the country, and prepared her heart; under the tuition of the divine Spirit, for the great change. She became the disciple of patience, and calmly waited the will of her heavenly Master. Finally, seeing her end was nigh, she returned to her own home to die, as she said, among her friends. Here, after almost unexampled suffering, in January last she passed to her rest. She leaves a married daughter and many pupils and friends to mourn her loss. Farewell, good friend! I trust we shall meet again. B. B. ROSS.

ESTHER TICKNOR PRATT was born in Columbia, Connecticut, January 24, 1803, and died, at her residence in Prattville, Alabama, February 15, 1875.

Trained by pious parents, she gave her heart to Christ in very early girlhood, and became thoroughly imbued with the principles and sentiments of his heavenly teaching. At the age of twenty-four (September 6, 1827) she was happily married to Hon. Daniel Pratt, a man of profound religious convictions, broad views of life, and strong domestic affections. The conditions of her life were therefore very favorable to the production of a well-formed Christian character, and her nature was cast in such a mold, and was of such a sort as to surrender itself freely and cheerfully to all the influences of these conditions. Hers were the peculiar features of the "virtuous woman" of the Old Testament model—industry, frugality, self-reliance, providence, and fidelity to the fortune, honor and happiness of her husband; and these, blending with the softer graces of the New Testament ideal woman—gentleness, kindness, modesty, hospitality, charity for the poor, and love for the Savior—made her character one of exceeding beauty, and her life one of uncommon usefulness.

One of her neighbors—Mr. Shadrack Mims—writes of her in the following language: "Thirty years' acquaintance with Mrs. Pratt, in the various relations of life, entitles me to say that she was a woman of rare qualities, both of mind and heart. While making no pretensions to high culture, she yet possessed a larger share of common sense than falls to the lot of most people; and this qualified her for the easy and successful discharge of all practical duties. Combined with this was great goodness of heart, which, sanctified by the grace of God, constitutes all that is amiable in woman. As a wife she was all that could be asked. 'The heart of her husband did safely trust in her.' As a mother she was tender and affectionate. As a mistress, humane and considerate. As a neighbor, kind and obliging. As a friend, firm and undeviating. As a Christian, consistent and devoted to God and his cause; always prompt in attendance upon the meetings of the church, from the public ministrations of the word to the less attractive but more spiritual social gatherings of the people. She was an active Sunday school teacher from the time I first knew her to her death. Having naturally a firm constitution, she labored to the last, so that when she ceased to live she ceased to work. Though steadily at work, she was unostentatious in her professions of religion, yet firm and trusting to the last. As to her business qualifications, in household matters she had no superior, and was as much entitled to be called the matron of Prattville as her husband was to be called its patron; for she assiduously co-operated with him, from its first settlement, in every plan to promote both its temporal prosperity and its moral and religious welfare; and after his death, which was two years ago, she told me she intended, as far as she could, to carry out all his purposes concerning the village. She possessed in a high degree order and system in all domestic affairs, so that, while entertaining a great deal of company of various sorts, she never seemed at all disturbed in mind by the cares of her house. She also had the happy art of making her guests feel easy and comfortable at her home. This was not acquired, but proceeded from the natural workings of a heart overflowing with sympathy. The flow of her spirit was lively, yet she controlled her temper and tongue, rarely giving offense to any."

Such is the testimony of her class-leader, and such also is the testimony of all who knew her. She assisted the orphan, was good to the poor, entertained the stranger, loved the church, and wore a bright, cheerful countenance. The death of this good woman is a bereavement to the town. Her last illness was pneumonia, painful and short. The morning before she died I visited her, and, having satisfied myself that she was rational, asked her if now in her extremity she could trust Jesus as her personal Savior. She replied: "I cannot remember the time when I could not trust him." I then repeated the language of St. Paul (Second Timothy iv, 6, etc.:) "I am now ready to be offered; the time of my departure is at hand," etc.; and asked her if she could use that as her own. Her answer was: "I think I can." Thus closed this beautiful life. May the faith that dwelt so richly in her descend through her surviving daughter to her grandchildren; and may they, while gazing through their tears up toward the home of the ascended saint, feel that her home in heaven is their home, because her Savior is theirs.

J. W. RUSH.

AT HER late residence near Shiloh, Union parish, Louisiana, Sister MATILDA TABOR, full of hope, fell asleep in Jesus, her soul ascending to the companionship of the glorified in heaven. My acquaintance with her began in 1851—introduced to her by her husband, Bro. Elijah Tabor (an estimable member of the Baptist Church), at a quarterly meeting in Farmerville, where I learned that she had long been a member of the Methodist Church. Our acquaintance grew into intimate Christian association. Her devotion to the church and its enterprises was marked by much Christian liberality. Her zeal for an enlightened Christian education knew no bounds scarcely. She arranged largely, in Homer, Louisiana, for the board of traveling preachers' children to be educated at Homer College. Some time before her death she made an offering to the church of her residence, and the lot of ground upon which it stood, worth some thousands of dollars, for a parsonage for Farmerville circuit, as I am advised. About the same time she contributed some $600 to the building of a neat church in Shiloh, for the use of the Methodist Episcopal Church South. She was the friend of the poor. The tear of anguish and want dried under the benign influence of her liberal bestowments. The throbbing bosom of destitute widowhood grew calm at the touch of her beneficent hat. Weeping orphanage became joyous when she said: "Be ye warmed and filled;" for she gave those things that were needed. Whatever enterprise had for its object the amelioration and bettering of our race met with a hearty response at her hand. With a strong native intellect and a well-cultivated mind, she could interest you on general topics, as well as the more vitally important movements of the church. Being strictly economical, she made no needless and foolish expenditures. Being brought up a Methodist, she was plain in her deportment and her dress.

She died of that distressing disease—acute gastritis. She was eighty-five years old on the eighth day of January last, and died on the twenty-second of the same month. The end of such a life as Sister Tabor's could not but be victorious, triumphant. Adding living strength to that most sublime declaration, "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord," with what strength of faith she marches up to the Jordan of death, and that faith throwing its light athwart the foaming billows anchoring upon the eternal shore! Then, bounding to the throne of God, she exclaims: "My suffering is great, but I will bear it; and soon be at rest with God. Yes, I shall soon be with the bright and shining angels in heaven." She would repeat from some of her favorite hymns: "How happy every child of grace," etc.; again:

"Children of the heavenly King,
As we journey let us sing;"

then ask for them to be sung. Is there a moment of man's earthly existence in which the thorough, unbiased convictions of the heart find utterance? It is when the light of the two worlds become blended and the traveler lingers amid them. Then stand with me, ye that doubt the truth and power of our holy religion, at the dying couch of one who had perhaps more than fifty years of Christian experience, and let us for a moment test its truth as well as its power to save. Hark! While the light of eternity is breaking in upon the departing pilgrim she exclaims: "I shall soon be at rest with God. Come, sing for me:

'How happy every child of grace
Who knows his sins forgiven.'

Yes, sing for me:

'Children of the heavenly King,
As we journey let us sing.'"

Now tell me, sir, if the sentiments contained in these sublime hymns were not in perfect accord with the sentiments and feelings of Sister Tabor's heart, would she have asked to have them sung? What assurance of the truth and power of religion to save. O vain man! say not that religion is a myth when it can give such confidence of victory gained and heaven won. O let it be known everywhere that the cross of Christ has gained another signal victory over infidelity, and transplanted another immortal on the glory shore. I ask you, Infidel, is there aught but the religion of the Bible that can gild the pathway to the tomb? O it is light, effulgent light, that comes streaming down from the throne of God, and blots out the darkness that is went to invest the vale of death, and discovers to the departing pilgrim the glory of the other shore. A. D. GASKELL.

Note.—This notice would have appeared some several weeks earlier but for a severe influenza which prostrated me for awhile.

LOSSES.

Upon the white sea sand
There sat a pilgrim band,
Telling the losses their lives had known,
While evening waned away
From breezy cliff and bay,
And the strong tides went out with a weary moan.

One spake with quivering lip
Of a fair-freighted ship,
With all his household to the deep gone down.
But one had wilder woe
For a fair face long ago
Lost in the darker depths of a great town.

There were some who mourned their youth
With a most loving truth,
For its brave hopes and memories ever green;
And one upon the West
Turned an eye that would not rest,
For far-off hills whereon its joy had been.

Some talked of vanished gold,
Some of proud honors told,
Some spake of friends that were their trust no more;
And one of a green grave,
Beside a foreign wave,
That made him sit so lonely on the shore.

But when their tales were done,
There spoke among them one,
A stranger, seeming from all sorrow free:
"Sad losses have ye met,
But mine is heavier yet,
For a believing heart hath gone from me."

"Alas!" these pilgrims said,
"For the living and the dead,
For fortune's cruelty, for love's sure cross,
For the wrecks of land and sea;
But however it came to thee—
Thine, stranger, is life's last and heaviest loss."

Father Boehm's Memories of a Hundred Years.

WRITTEN FROM HIS LIPS, BY THE REV. JOHN ATKINSON.

BISHOP ROBERTS.

In 1813-14 I was presiding elder on the Schuylkill district, which composed the whole of the territory of the present Philadelphia Conference, and a portion of the Wilmington Conference, including the city of Wilmington. Among the preachers stationed in the district at that time were Robert R. Roberts and John Emory, both of whom subsequently became Bishops. They resided and labored in the city of Philadelphia. I had very pleasant and kindly relations with both of those good and great men. I was at that time a bachelor. Mr. Roberts invited me to make his house my stopping-place when in the city, which invitation I accepted, and was domiciled with him for about a fortnight each quarter that my work brought me to Philadelphia. I considered his house my home. Roberts was about the average height and rather stout. His countenance was open and bland, and expressive of benignity. In manners he was very courteous and kind. In his family he was hospitable, and had the happy art of making all feel at ease and at home in his house. He was a man of superior intellect, and was most nicely balanced in both his mental and emotional nature. As a preacher he was rather commanding. His sermons were characterized by clear, strong thinking, evangelical sentiment, apt and forcible language, and an impressive delivery.

In 1816 Mr. Roberts was elected Bishop. He carried such a bearing and manner into his office as to command wide influence. I was on very intimate relations with him, both before and after he became Bishop, and I have spent many happy moments with him. The Methodist Episcopal Church has been greatly favored in the character of the men who have filled this important office, and to none of them have its weighty responsibilities been intrusted with greater safety than to Roberts.

He was a very laborious man. During most of the time of his episcopal service, which comprised more than a quarter of a century, our Bishops did not travel in railway cars, nor even in stage coaches, but on horseback. Roberts perseveringly rode round his diocese through all seasons and weathers, from the extreme western frontier of the country to New England and the south as far as the Gulf of Mexico. His journeyings were often very lonely, through unbroken wildernesses and very sparsely settled territory. He would probably frequently ride all day without food, except breakfast and a frugal supper; at least that was the case with Bishop Asbury when I traveled with him. I have known Asbury to take a cracker or two out of his pocket, at the side of a spring in the wilderness, and, taking off his hat, ask a blessing upon it, and eat it with the utmost content, and then journey on until night. Roberts, no doubt, was familiar with like experiences.

Fatigued with the travel of a lonely day, he would often guide his horse to the door of a solitary but welcome cabin in the forest, and, obtaining permission to pass the night under its friendly roof, he would dismount and partake of such humble fare as his host could give him, spend the evening in pleasant conversation, and after prayers with the family retire to rest, sometimes in the only room the house contained. Then the next morning he would pursue his way toward some distant Conference.

By means of the unwearying labors and journeyings of the weather-beaten itinerants of those days the foundations of the Methodist Episcopal Church were securely laid in America. And such apostolic Bishops as Roberts contributed greatly to the advancement of the work by never-faltering constancy and endurance, and wise and vigilant supervision. No storms delayed them, no winter's blasts deterred them from their constant march, no kind and hospitable fireside lured them from their rugged path in the wilderness; but onward they pressed, through snow drifts, ice, floods and hurricanes, seeking souls for whom Jesus died.

Those heroic men were, under God, the saviors of this nation. But for the itinerancy the great West would have become a grand theater of barbarism. They followed the westward march of empire as rapidly as it extended. They were careless about pecuniary compensation. Their highest reward, and that which chiefly they sought, was souls. In many cases their whole year's recompense would not amount to a hundred dollars, and frequently not half that sum; but they exulted in the far richer treasure of a joy unspeakable and full of glory, and they gathered multitudes of wanderers into the Savior's fold, and kept heaven ecstatic with the joy of angels over repenting sinners. Though poor, they were constantly making many rich, and contributing to rear in moral grandeur a great nation of freemen, whose bulwarks are the Bible, the church, the school and the press. Roberts was a conspicuous and noble leader among those moral heroes, and deserves to be held in grateful remembrance not only by the church, but by the nation.

Roberts and myself entered the Methodist itinerancy at nearly the same time—about the beginning of this century. I was a year or two his senior in the service, but he first obtained his release. At that time the country was but sparsely settled, and its population was comparatively small. Towns were then new, and none of our cities had attained any considerable magnitude. Cincinnati was then a small town. Philadelphia only extended up Market street to about Fourth street. Jersey City had no existence when I first traveled across its site in 1808. The extreme limits of New York in the same year hardly reached to Canal street from the battery. Canal street was not then opened, and the water ebbed and flowed where now are its buildings and pavements. There were few settlements, comparatively speaking, west of the Ohio river when I began my travels with Bishop Asbury in the year 1808. Methodism has therefore grown up with the country, and I have witnessed the marvelous development of the church to which I have devoted my long life, and of the country for whose welfare myself and my "old companions in distress" wandered as pilgrims up and down the land.

They are all gone before, glorious, heroic band, they stand in triumph on the heavenly shore! Asbury, Whatcoat, Lee, Ware, Roberts, Chandler and their compeers are there, and I hasten to greet them again. My soul rejoices in the prospect. I shall see them soon, not as then we were, dust-soiled and weary in our rough wilderness journeyings, but crowned victors, with palms and harps, the white robes, and the new song of heaven. All hail! ye glorified partners of my toils and tears. All hail!—Methodist.

First the Blade.

The progressive work in the soul, by which the divine life is perfected, is beautifully set forth in the parable. First the blade appears. How exceedingly small and tender is its tiny point as it rises above the ground, so that the wonder is how it can force its way through the hard soil. How pleased we are to see it! But how unlike it is to the full corn in the ear! A little blow would crush it to the earth; and yet it has within it the life and hope of the future harvest, and carries up from the seed-bed in the ground the very form and substance of the coming full ear. Such are the beginnings of the Christian life. We look upon them with delight, as we do upon springing spiracles in our garden or field. The child Christian, or the later convert, puts forth, first, some little signs of promise, which are eagerly watched and hailed, just as are the cracking and breaking of the earth over the seed sown. Now comes forth the blade. In the child rightly trained there will be noticed conscientiousness, habits of prayer, love of religious duties, interest in works of charity, hatred of evil ways, and all this growing plainer and stronger, like the blade as it advances upward, until we can say, in the one case: This is corn, and no mistake; and in the other: This is piety. So the young Christian is seen progressing in God's own way and means by prayer, and all divine helps, to an advanced stage in the divine life; or, where a person late in life receives the good seed of the word, you shall see the blade appear in an increased seriousness, less interest in the world's pleasures, retirement to the closet for prayer, in greater efforts to overcome sin, in listening to the word with fixed eye and serious heart, in a deepened sense of sinfulness and a desire to serve God, with at length a hope of pardon and acceptance, with a public confession of Christ and a holy walk with God. This is grace in the blade. It is very imperfectly developed, and the young Christian must be very careful not to think he has already attained, either is already perfect. There is a great work for him yet to do, and he is to use all diligence, not feeling, as many seem to feel, as if, when received to the Lord's table, the work were done. There is this comfort, however, that if the child Christian be taken away at this stage all will be well with him, for the budding plant will be only transplanted to ripen in a better soil; and we are to learn also from the parable not to expect too much from the child Christian or the young convert. The green blade does not change in a day to the yellow corn. Such rapid growth, if it occur, is like that of Jonah's gourd, and the zeal of many a young convert has soon died away.

But where a good work of grace has been commenced, God may be expected to carry it on to perfection. The next thing set forth in the process is the appearance of the ear, which denotes the Christian in the maturity of his growth and experience. Such a one will be found to have been all the while advancing. Sometimes, indeed, it will appear to such a follower of the Lord as if he were not growing at all, or were growing worse. When we watch a field of corn it will at times look pale and sickly, as if it would never come to anything, while at other times we can almost see it grow. So is it with grace in the soul. Sometimes it seems almost to die away, and then again it revives; but, upon the whole, there is evident growth, so that a true Christian will be able to see that he has made advance in the divine life in years of profession, just as in the course of months the corn gets taller, though its growth be not visible from day to day. A young Christian judges of his piety by his frames and feelings, by his comfort in prayer and religious duties, and by his excitement and zeal; an older Christian looks away from these to the cross of Christ, draws his comfort from thence, and learns to live by faith in the Son of God. A young Christian is apt to be uncharitable, but as he grows older he learns to be severe only upon his own faults. He grows in self-knowledge, and in the knowledge of God's word, in deadness to the world, and in all the graces of the Spirit, and his duties and religious exercises become fixed and habitual. Such, briefly, is the change from the blade to the ear.

Then follows the transition from the ear to the full corn. When the grain is formed it takes some weeks to ripen, but after awhile we notice it puts on its golden hue, indicating meetness for the harvest, and we notice, too, that when it begins to change color it changes rapidly, so that in a few days a whole field passes from a green to a golden hue. Then the farmer hastens himself for the reaping. And so we have often seen followers of Christ, just before they were called away, more engaged than ever in religious duties, more saintly and fervent, and ripening rapidly for the sickle. This is sometimes witnessed in young disciples; and, even in the case of children about to be early called, parents and friends have looked upon their exceeding loveliness with fear as well as delight, because they took it as an indication that earth would not hold them long. The mature or aged Christian winds up his worldly affairs, sits loose to earthly attachments, is more with his God, and more earnest in doing good just before he dies, than ever. Perhaps God whispers to his soul a presentiment that he is soon to be taken, or else gives to him a larger measure of grace, just as he sometimes in autumn gives the very weather to make grain ripen, so that his servant is incited to holy diligence as his work draws near its close. Of many a departed one we say that he seemed conscious beforehand that his death was near, and so ripened fast for heaven. This is the full corn in the ear.

And then immediately God putteth in the sickle, because the harvest is come. We shall not stay here on earth for some chance stroke to remove us. There will be the time of harvest when we shall be ripe for heaven, as one very young may be, or when God's purposes shall be ripened, as they may be toward the aged sinner, and then the sickle of death will be put in without delay. Happy they who are found as the full corn in the ear when the harvest comes. The reaper gathers all at harvest-time—the green ear, the half ripe and the ripe—but he puts into his granary only that which is most matured, and values that most, though he may not throw away the half ripe. And so, though our God may bring Christians of all degrees of perfectness to heaven, he will prize most those who have most improved under the means of grace.—Rev. H. Lewis, D. D.

Always Abounding.

The Apostle Paul, reaching the climax of his argument in the fifteenth chapter of the First Epistle to the Corinthians, urges upon Christians that they should be "always abounding in the work of the Lord." The exhortation is applicable now.

"Always abounding"—it involves much. There is to be no cessation of Christian work. There must be no folding of the hands. There must be no indolent moments. Always! Every year and every day, while life lasts, the Christian must in some form or other be at his Master's business. The individual character of the work will, of course, vary. But in some way or other the Christian will be always abounding. Then the emphasis comes on another word—abounding. The Christian works not merely from a sense of duty. He has entered upon a service of love. He works, therefore, not as a slave under the eye of a task-master. His is the service of a loving child. He will do all he can. He will work with zest. And so he will abound. It will be a full and hearty service he will render.

To this "always abounding" service the Christian is called by the fact that he is a child of God. Nothing less than this can be expected of him. Is he his own? Is it not his heavenly Father who has a claim upon all that he can render? Shall the child of God dole out his service in stinted measure? Can he do it?

Gratitude calls to it. The Christian is saved with an abundant salvation. Full and free and priceless is the gift of life in Jesus Christ. Shall not he, then, who has received all, give the utmost he can in return?

Desire for growth calls to it. The arm grows most in muscular power which is exercised the most. The mind grows most in intellectual force which is used the most. Similarly the Christian who is "always abounding in the work of the Lord" will grow most rapidly in every Christian grace.

The claims of fallen humanity call for it. So much to do—a world fast rushing to destruction. So few to work—only here and there those who love the Lord Jesus. What need, then, that all such should always abound in every good word and work.

The sure promise calls to it. It is not labor thrown away. It is not even labor of doubtful success. It is work that leads to certain and everlasting results. There is no work done for God that fails fruitless to the ground. The promise is sure: "Be ye always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord."—American Messenger.

THE Dayton Empire makes bold to remark that "when an intelligent compositor makes 'fiscal year' read 'lish-ball year,' it may be reasonably concluded that his mind was wandering." And we should say his mind was wandering toward the nutriment it most needed.

A Mammoth Cave in Nevada.

The entrance to the cavern is located about three miles northeast from Star City, and about two thousand feet higher than the town, in the Humboldt range, eight miles from the Central Pacific railroad. It has been known to the Indians perhaps for ages, and they say that many years ago it afforded a passage through the mountain to a point opposite where the Humboldt House now stands. A Piute legend says that it has been the home of the evil spirit for many generations, and the bravest warrior of the tribe will not venture near its mouth for any purpose whatever. They say that before the whites came among them they put bad Indians in the cave to appease the wrath and hunger of the spirit that inhabited it. The last Indian put in there was not as bad as represented, and was guided to the opening on the other side by the spirit. The cave was partially explored in 1863 by Captain Prescott, James A. Banks (who was since killed by the Indians near Camp Scott,) and A. J. Simmons (now an Indian agent in Montana Territory.) Some time ago a party of four, of which your correspondent was one, proceeded to explore the cave. We had heard a great deal about it, and were anxious to see a little of it ourselves. On arriving at the place we discovered, to our surprise, that the entrance was fifteen feet above the ground rock on which we stood. The rock rises almost perpendicularly one hundred and fifty feet above the mouth, and for several hundred feet on each side. Having been provided with ropes, one was thrown over a point of rock which projects over the mouth of the cavern, by means of which the entrance was gained. Lighting our pitch-pine torches, we proceeded cautiously in single file about one hundred feet in what appeared like a large mining tunnel. The ceiling was from ten to fifteen feet high in this distance, after which it narrowed to a crack just large enough to get through. Suddenly we came to a square jump-off or perpendicular drop of thirty feet. Again the rope was brought into requisition, and by means of it the bottom was reached. Immediately under the road we had traversed we found large chambers, the largest of which I should judge to be forty feet square and sixty feet high, the entrance being scarcely large enough to crawl through. Here in this chamber we noticed a verification of the adage that "constant dropping will wear away a stone." In several places drops of water from the ceiling, which continually fell in one place—there being no air current to change their course—had worn holes in the solid, flinty floor from five to seven inches deep. We explored the cave to a distance of a mile from the entrance, and our lights burning well showed that the cavern is well ventilated. We did not find a passage through, though we traveled for three hours and a half by the watch, and arrived at the entrance very much fatigued. We started two bats at about three-fourths of a mile from the entrance, and they screamed like wildcats when they saw our lights.—Citizen.

THE NEW DRYING PROCESS.—Mr. George Woods, of Cambridgeport, Massachusetts, the well-known organ-maker, has discovered a new process for drying lumber and other material which is exciting much interest among manufacturers as well as scientific men.

In the usual drying-rooms the steam pipes are carried under the lumber and the air forced to pass over it. Thus the outside is always dried first, and the internal air may be so damp and so soon saturated with moisture as not to affect the interior parts. He uses steam pipes arranged in the same manner underneath the lumber, but the moisture which is driven by the heat into the room, instead of being carried off by the ventilating current, with great consequent loss of heat, is condensed by the cold of water constantly running in pipes through the chamber; the condensed moisture runs down the pipes into a grooved channel below, by which it flows out of the chamber. Thus the moisture is gradually, uniformly and constantly withdrawn from the wood, which dries regularly, without strain on the outside or cracking on the inside.

He saves three-quarters of the time required and all the heat, which, in ordinary rooms, passes off with the ventilation. This method is applicable to laundries, to the drying of cloths and wools in factories, and to any material, organic or inorganic, which requires to be dried speedily and uniformly.

He has taken one hundred and thirty-six gallons of water in seven days from nine thousand feet of lumber, as follows: On the third day, after the steam was let on, the water came away at the rate of a gallon in forty minutes, till on the seventh one hundred and thirty-six gallons had been drawn off, and the water ceased running, which indicated that the process was completed.—Methodist.

THE "bayonet" tells us that it was first made at Bayonne; "cambrics," that they came from Cambray; "damask," from Damascus; "arras," from the city of the same name; "cordwain," or "cordova," from Cordova; the "guinea," that it was originally coined of gold brought from the African coast so called; "camlet," that it was woven, at least in part, of camel's hair. Such has been the manufacturing progress of England that we now send our calicoes and muslins to India and the East; yet the words give standing witness that we once imported them thence; for "calico" is from Calicut, and "muslin" from Moussul, a city in Asiatic Turkey.

MANY MEN, without being hypocrites at heart, surround themselves with an atmosphere of insincerity in the intercourse of life which destroys to that extent their faith in the reality of others. Let us not pretend to more than we have and are. Those who have homes should especially seek to keep them free from everything that is false.—Ker.

Religious Intelligence.

ACCORDING to recent official statistics the number of scholars in the Sunday schools of the Presbyterian Church, North and South, is 625,434, and of the Baptist Church of the United States, 630,152 scholars. The Methodist Episcopal Church has a school membership more than double both denominations, namely, 1,383,227.

THE Georgia Conference of the African Methodist Episcopal Church recently met at Albany, Georgia. The churches of all denominations were opened to the Conference, and services were held in each. Bishop Ward preached by invitation in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, and seats were especially reserved for whites.

REV. J. E. BROWN, of the Chapel of Free Grace, in New York, has withdrawn from the Protestant Episcopal Church and united with the Reformed Episcopal Church. The officers and congregation of the Protestant Episcopal Church, St. Clair, Michigan, have withdrawn from that organization and united with the Reformed Episcopal Church.

AT THE meeting of the executive committee of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, December 9, 1874, it was reported that the ship Jason, having on board the Rev. Messrs. Hennesey and Clipsham and Miss Searle, had taken fire off Dungeness, and that the passengers had been saved, but had lost all their effects on board. Schoolmasters are wanted for three stations.

THE Congregationalists in England have just opened and dedicated a memorial-hall in London on the site of the old Fleet Prison. It derives its name from the fact that it has been erected in memory of those two thousand Church of England clergymen who declined to subscribe to the act of uniformity, preferring rather to vacate their livings and cast themselves upon the world.

AN influential deputation from the Evangelical Alliance to the Sultan of Turkey left England for Turkey during the month of January to present an address to the Sultan, asking him to put a stop to the persecution of Christians in his dominions. The deputation consists of Lord Francis Conyngham, M. P., the Hon. and Rev. E. V. Blight, the Rev. J. S. Blackwood, D. D., Messrs. Samuel Gurney, Jabez Johnson and R. N. Fowler, and the secretary of the Alliance, the Rev. Mr. Davis.

THE American branch of the Evangelical Alliance have adopted a letter advising against holding the next General Conference at Rome, Italy; and they propose Dublin or Edinburg. Similar views have been published by some of the European branches. There might be a sentimental interest in meeting at Rome, but evidently the time is not yet for such a movement. It is far more important that the Alliance shall be surrounded by a Christian and Protestant population, and that it bide its time for going to the Eternal City.

A SCOTTISH Christian gentleman has shown his munificence to the cause of religion in a manner that makes ordinary mortals hold their breaths. Not long ago he gave half a million sterling—about two and a half millions of dollars—to the Established Church of Scotland; and now, says the Belfast Witness, he is credited with the intention of bestowing a gift of like amount on the nonconformist churches of his native land. The large-hearted man, who thus enjoys his great wealth by giving it away to worthy objects, is Mr. Baird, of Cambusdoon, the head of a great iron-making firm.

DEFEAT OF A SUNDAY DESECRATION MOVEMENT IN AUSTRALIA.—A movement in favor of opening some public institutions on Sunday has led to vehement opposition, and failed for the present. Sunday in Melbourne is always strictly observed, the shops are closed and the streets empty, except when the congregations pour in or out of the places of worship. No trains run on the government lines, and the public houses are not allowed to be open, though it is said drinking goes on in them much as usual. The Roman Catholics supported the proposal to open the National Gallery; but the objectors prevailed by a majority of 39 to 25, notwithstanding that a petition with nearly 20,000 signatures was presented in favor of the change.

THE gospel is preached regularly in at least one hundred and twenty-four places in Italy by pastors and evangelists of the Waldensian, the Free Italian Church, English Methodists, American Baptists and Methodists, and the Brethren. Sixty-six stations are in northern Italy, including Piedmont, Sardinia and Liguria, just half of the Waldensian churches being in the valley of the Po. In central Italy there are forty-seven churches, and more than half of the Free Church strength in the country is here; also all of the American Methodists save one church in Venetia. The English Methodists and the Waldensians are the only workers in southern Italy and Sicily, with the exception of one American Baptist church. Efficient and zealous men to labor as pastors and evangelists seem to be the especial need of Italian missions.

REV. DR. QUINT'S annual statement of the strength and condition of the Congregational churches in this country has appeared, as usual, in the Congregational Quarterly. The membership of the denomination is 330,391—a net increase of 6,712. The larger gains were in New York, Massachusetts, Ohio, Michigan, Iowa, Wisconsin, Missouri, Minnesota and Connecticut. There was a net loss of 506 in Vermont, once a stronghold of the denomination; of 113 in Illinois, and 68 in New Hampshire. The net increase in the membership was 40 per cent. larger than that of the preceding year. The number of new churches was 130; the number dropped was 52. Of the new churches, 62 are west of the Mississippi, an evidence that home missionaries have not been idle. The increase in the membership of Sabbath schools has been nearly 13,000; the falling off in the contributions for benevolent purposes was about $25,000. Attention is called to the tendency to employ licentiates and ministers of other denominations. Dr. Quint's array of facts and figures is exhaustive and minute, the above summary of the more important particulars being condensed by the Congregationalist.

RELIGIOUS MOVEMENT IN ST. PETERSBURG.—In a letter on the charitable institutions of Russia "L." says: "We may rejoice to think that England has furnished the example for at least some of the good works carried on—specially the 'Bible woman' movement, which is being adopted in its completeness by one excellent lady who saw the working of it here, and who has now started such women in different parts of the city, holding meetings and selling clothing as we do here. She told me that she had just secured one mission woman, whose value she was sure could not be exceeded by any we had in England. Another lady, equally familiar with our language and plans, is about to set on foot a Russian British Workman paper, nothing of the kind existing at present for the lower classes, whose growing intelligence now demands some suitable literary food."

PEOPLE who are disposed to look condescendingly upon the Bible as an obsolete book—a volume whose teachings have been superseded by those of science and philosophy—a book which is interesting only to theologians—must be greatly perplexed by paragraphs which occasionally creep into print, even in newspapers which make no pretense of supplying religious news. The latest of these is that the British and Foreign Bible Society have distributed during the past year, nearly forty thousand Bibles in Russia, and that new editions are necessary. Although a demand for any particular book does not necessarily prove its value, the frequent recurrence of such bits of information about the Bible shows that the old book does not lose its interest, and that neither the attacks of its foes nor the unwisdom of its friends can prevent its retaining its influence upon the human mind.

THE almanac of the Protestant Episcopal Church for 1875 gives the average percentage of the church's increase in members during the past year. In the dioceses this has been 5.93 per cent., in the missionary jurisdictions 13.14 per cent. Twelve dioceses report 10,000 communicants and upward, to wit: Albany, 10,000; Central New York, 10,053; Western New York, 10,676; Ohio, 11,599; Long Island, 11,792; Virginia, 11,831; New Jersey, 12,116; Massachusetts, 12,492; Maryland, 16,442; Connecticut, 17,129; Pennsylvania, 20,690; New York, 28,834. The average contributions per communicant for all purposes during 1873 were, in the dioceses, $25.94; in the missionary jurisdictions, $28.97. In 1873 the average for the former was $29.43, for the latter $42.37. The following statement shows in what the church has increased and decreased during 1874: Bishops, 1 decrease; clergy, 45 increase; ordinations, 31 decrease; candidates, 137 decrease; churches consecrated, 12 increase; baptisms, 2,055 increase; confirmations, 3,373 increase; communicants, 13,554 increase; marriages, 87 decrease; burials 528 decrease; Sunday school teachers 3,783 decrease; Sunday school scholars, 2,621 increase; contributions, $127,194.46 decrease.

BISHOPS AND GOVERNMENT IN GERMANY.—The correspondent of the London Guardian gives an explanation of the difference between the episcopal conscience in Austria and in Prussia, in both of which the same church legislation is in force. The Bishop of Breslau has Austrian parishes in his diocese, and he has always notified his nomination of clergy to the Austrian officials; in Silesia he refuses to do this, and calls it a sin against the divine law. And then we find that the Bishop has large diocesan property in Austria, 60,000 "yokes" of forest land, which brings him in 200,000 florins a year, while the Prussian government only grants him 30,000 thalers a year. Apart from papal orders, it is easy to make a choice between the two governments when a stand against the worldly power is necessary; it would not do to run the risk of the confiscation of £20,000 a year. The Archbishop of Olmutz is in exactly the same situation; his Austrian diocesan property brings him in 400,000 florins yearly, while his small farm in Silesia is worth only £600 a year; he can afford thus the luxury of disobeying in Prussia the law which he obeys in Austria.

LIBERAL CATHOLIC CONFERENCE AT BERNE.—A conference was held at Berne, on the twenty-second of December, of representatives of the cantonal governments of Berne, Argovie, Thurgovie, Soleure, Basle-Campagne, St. Gall, Schaffhouse and Geneva, to discuss questions touching the relations of the church reform movement with these governments. M. Vigier, of Soleure, was chosen president; the central committee of Liberal Catholics was represented by MM. Kalser, Brosy, Morel and Winkler. After considerable discussion the following resolutions were adopted: "The Assembly expresses to the central committee of the society of Swiss Liberal Catholics their wish that they should proceed in the following manner: 1. That they should address the cantonal governments to obtain their recognition of the Christian Catholic Church as established by the constitution decreed at Olten, on the twenty-first of September, 1874, as forming a religious corporation. 2. To inquire of the cantonal governments in what way they desire to take part in the nomination of the Bishop. 3. To further the elaboration by the cantonal governments of common regulations for the examination of students of theology." As the last two points must necessarily be the object of an understanding between the different cantonal governments, it was decided, further, to request the government of Soleure to charge itself with bringing about such understanding.

CHANGE OF RATES.

In conformity with an agreement between the several papers published in the interest of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, the subscription price of the ADVOCATE, including postage, will hereafter be as follows, viz.:

One year	$2 50
Six months	1 50
Three months	80

THE SUBSCRIPTION PRICE of the ADVOCATE is One Dollar and a Quarter per year to ministers of the gospel, and the same to the widows of deceased itinerant preachers. Where bills have been sent charging them more than that amount it was owing to the fact that they were not known as such to the book-keeper, and if they will inform us the accounts will be corrected. Should they have already paid we will credit the amount overpaid on subscription, or dispose of it as they may order.

LOOK OUT FOR ACKNOWLEDGMENTS.—Subscribers and other persons writing to us should look in the letter list for the acknowledgment of their letters. The letters which reach us on or before Saturday of each week are acknowledged in the issue of the following Thursday.

RATES.

The New Orleans Christian Advocate will be furnished to subscribers hereafter at the following rates, including postage:

One Year	$2 50
Six Months	1 50
Three Months	80

$1.25 A YEAR

to all Ministers of the Gospel, traveling or local; and widows of deceased traveling preachers.

to any person forwarding to us four new yearly subscribers, with TEN DOLLARS.

God in Praise.

"Thou that inhabitest the praises of Israel" is one of several descriptive titles which the Old Testament saints used in addressing Jehovah. God was in the thickest of the song, and his presence was manifest in the swelling anthem, and in the billows of melody which rolled over the vast assembly. Praise, as thus conceived of, is an intensely religious service, certainly not less sacred than prayer, and is directly related to the soul's most solemn and intimate approaches to God. God is "fearful in praises"—that is, we suppose, to be praised with reverence, and with proper conceptions of his infinite and holy nature. The leaders of the praises in the days of David and of Asaph were Levites, and priests, consecrated persons, in keeping with the sacredness of the duty.

All we would infer from these considerations is that our church music should be in the hands of devout people, and that the leaders or choir should not be composed of the wicked and irreligious. Certainly some measure of seriousness and piety should be required of those who are most prominent in this part of divine worship. It would be about as comely and fitting for ungodly men of gifts to lead the people in prayer as in song, for one is just as sacred and spiritual as the other. If the prayer of the wicked is an abomination, is not his praise an abomination also? We are now referring to the character of those who are selected to lead in the worship. One is as sacred as the other. Prayer and praise are both offered to the Most High, and both should be in the beauty of holiness. It must be an insult to God and an affront to the divine majesty when the praise of a church is committed to those who are destitute of piety. God dwells in the praises of Israel, but does he inhabit such praises as a godless quartette and an infidel organist offer?

Praise is for the people. They may need leaders, but it must not be done by proxy. God inhabits the praises of Israel, the praises of his people, and the command is: "Let all the people praise thee." Do our religious people generally make this a question of duty? We fear the most of them have no conscience on the subject. There ought to be good music; they like to hear and enjoy it, and, so somebody carries on this part of the service, they are content. They may even take the trouble to open their hymn-books, but they are at no pains to sing, and give themselves no concern to learn how. God can hardly dwell in the praises of a congregation where this slovenly indifference exists. Parents are careful to teach their children to pray, to instruct them in the most of their religious duties, to establish in them the habit of church-going, but in the matter of singing they are left pretty much to themselves. Comparatively little pains is taken to impress the children with the duty, or to have them taught the art of singing.

In nothing connected with our church services is the Holy Spirit so fearfully grieved as in the service of song. With whatever instrumental helps and choir-leaders they may deem best, it is the business of the people to render this service of praise. To be careless about it, to be negligent of taking a personal part in it, is most censurable in all who pretend to worship God in spirit and in truth. To give this service over to the profane and irreligious, and to set it off in a loft as something apart, is little better than a mockery. No service is more effective for good than this of praise where it is hearty and congregational. God is in it, and it is made the means of converting sinners, and of quickening the spiritual life of believers. Revivals are almost always attended by lively and hearty singing. At our camp meetings we must get the people to singing before much spiritual power is manifested. Without congregational singing a church is cold and dead. God inhabits the praises of Israel, but he cannot and will not dwell where there is only a travesty of this sacred and sublime service.

Mr. Wesley exhibited his usual wisdom in giving special attention to congregational singing. The Wesleys wrote hymns, and insisted that the people should sing, and to this their success in evangelizing the masses was largely due. Methodism and every form of church life will die out unless this feature of worship is made prominent. It must be made a matter of conscience with our people to sing. At present they have little conscience about it. It is with them not an essential of their personal worship—only a matter of taste, convenience, or to be delegated to a professional class. If we wish to be Christianity in earnest, and to maintain the character of a revival church, we must give increased attention to this subject. Let our people not be misled by the advertised choirs and operatic entertainments of other churches. The thing needed is to get our people to sing—to sing as a duty, as a means of grace, and as a condition of the divine presence and power in our assemblies.

We insist upon singing as a duty, as a part of worship in which all the people should participate. If we can awaken conscience upon the subject, and conviction of the vital importance of it to our spiritual prosperity, the means of securing the end will be readily suggested. Let us stop mocking God, grieving the Holy Spirit, and killing our church life by our indifference and perversions of this service, and let us have praises such as God can inhabit.

Providing for a Rainy Day.

We have a steadily growing esteem for people who are careful and provident in the management of their worldly affairs. We like these virtues of industry and economy more and more as we see the want and sorrows which might have been averted by their exercise. People who spend as they go, with no effort to provide for age, sickness and other contingencies which may reasonably be expected to arise, are not rightly in their senses. It is little better than a madness for them to be advancing along a path which is sure to bring them at length where health and other conditions of labor fail, at the same time that their eyes are entirely closed to the calamities which this negligence brings upon a very large class of mankind.

Much of poverty and want is doubtless inevitable. As the world is constituted, and as society is organized, it cannot be otherwise. Floods, droughts, war, grasshoppers and mishaps in commercial pursuits, bring consequences which human foresight cannot avoid. There are multitudes of the laboring poor who can scarcely meet their daily wants by the most devoted industry. And other multitudes are the involuntary victims of crime and intemperance. They suffer by no fault of their own. Then, in times like the present, when general prostration rests upon the finances and business of the country, a large amount of destitution exists which no sagacity or caution could have prevented.

With all due allowance, however, for the inevitable, there are cases almost innumerable of want, which are owing to the lack of prudence and carefulness in the past. In times of prosperity they were ambitious of position and social influence; and living up to their income that they might keep pace in some degree with the fashions, and affecting a style that exhausted their resources, the time of trial finds them without means to meet the most necessary demands. The time was when, by some self-denial and by independence of spirit spurning all pretensions to a position which their circumstances did not warrant, they might have saved something for the hour of adversity. The attempt of the poor to live in the same style as the rich, to dress as well, and to indulge in the same expensive tastes, has wrecked and stranded thousands upon thousands.

To live fully up to an income is only less ruinous than to live beyond it. Where all depends on the continuance of health, vigorous manhood and prosperous times, with nothing whatever in reserve, the catastrophe is not uncertain. The average classes of industrious people, whether engaged in mechanical, agricultural or other callings, can, under favorable conditions, save and accumulate, if they avoid all extravagance, and are content to live as their circumstances require. There are those who are pressed with want now because they have been idle and thriftless, or because they have wasted the wages of their toil in expensive social pleasures. Young men especially are most forgetful of the casualties that may overtake them, and the first fruits of their labor—the wages and salaries of their earlier years—are too often thrown away upon the most trivial amusements, or lost in the whirl of gaming and other forms of dissipation. Those who might have accumulated slowly and steadily have waited for the opportunity of making their fortune at once by some lucky speculation, or, because their savings must be small, they have not thought it worth their while to try to provide for a rainy day.

The most pitiable instances of destitution, and those which involve the sharpest anguish and humiliations, are those which may be traced to the recklessness and improvidence of more prosperous times. Our social system is boiling over with the passion for riches, but it is the desire for wealth, without the economy and industry which alone can secure it honestly. This haste to be rich, without regard to the means, is a fruitful source of poverty. Gambling in stocks or fraudulent transactions may bring wealth, but the same processes which bring it take it away. The words of Solomon apply with peculiar force to these days of wild speculation and business gambling: "Wilt thou set thine eyes upon that which is not? for riches certainly make themselves wings; they fly away as an eagle toward heaven." In these days riches fly away more certainly and more swiftly, because of the manner in which they are made. Money-making is largely a game of chance or of fraud, by which one man prospers on the misfortunes of another, and by which the gains of the successful are accurately measured by the losses of the unfortunate. Under such a system there can be no assurance of a competency. No one can tell whether he will be at the top or the bottom of the wheel, or whether it will be high or low tide with him when compelled to retire from the exciting struggle. The way in which money is sought and made breeds the extravagance and recklessness which leaves the possessor impoverished and ruined in the end.

The maxims and political economy of Franklin may have savored somewhat of sordidness and miserly greed, but they were infinitely better than the wasteful and dishonest spirit of the present day. Poor Richard's almanac would be an excellent tract for general distribution throughout the country. Sober industry, submission to steady hard work and an honest provision for the future, are more needed than at any time in our national history.

The poverty and suffering through the whole land, and especially in the large cities, flows at least in part from a reckless and extravagant mode of living, which precluded making judicious provision for sickness, age and business stagnation. A more careful and frugal course, such as reason and wisdom suggest, would have saved thousands from an anguish which it beggars language to describe. The lesson which the present distress should impress upon all classes is the duty of looking before us, and of aiming to guard against the sufferings which negligence and folly are sure to entail upon us sooner or later.

Concert for Centenary College.

NEW ORLEANS, March 19, 1875.

MR. EDITOR: As the Southern Methodists of New Orleans have in many ways shown heretofore their warm interest in this venerable institution, I venture to hope that at the concert which is presently to be given in its support, at St. Patrick's Hall, every one of our friends and of its friends will be present, either in person or by proxy. The proceeds of the occasion will go directly to the supplementing the tuition receipts of the faculty. As we have no endowment fund, I have for the last four years made collections by personal appeal, both public and private, to provide this supplement. But the times have so changed, and other burdens have so increased, that the present method has been taken as one likely to reach the largest number of the supporters and annual contributors to the college with the least difficulty. To the ladies of the several congregations we especially look for assistance. "Many hands make light work." I remember once in the Attakapas to have counted fourteen Frenchmen on one small roof, all at work. It was a pleasant and an instructive sight; there was good sense and good neighborship in it. I could wish that Methodism would adopt the French style of shingling, instead of attempting, as we often do, so much with so few hands.

Under the pressure of affairs, as administered for Louisiana and Mississippi somewhere at the North, our institutions of learning generally languish; but, thanks to a merciful Providence, this college, though cast down, has not been destroyed. The prayers of holy men, no longer among us, have been remembered. Its bow abides. A number of students are found in its halls, and it is doing good work for the church and the State in affording the opportunity of higher education to many who otherwise could not obtain it. As this, then, is emphatically our own institution, and has no one to rely upon in its hour of need but our own people, I trust that the rally to its aid will be cheerful and general on the thirteenth of April.

Yours, etc., J. C. KEENER.

Athanasius.

This eminent father, theologian and Bishop was born in Alexandria, Egypt, about A. D. 296. He was brought up and educated with a view to the Christian ministry, by Alexander, Bishop of Alexandria. When quite young he gave bright promise of a distinguished future. When but a youth he formed the acquaintance and became intimate with Anthony, the hermit, known as "St. Anthony." This gave a bias to his character toward monastic and ascetic life. He wrote the life of Anthony. This whole tendency of the early ages of the church grew out of the belief of the inherent moral corruption of matter, and that the highest purity was only to be attained by the mortifying the flesh, and crushing out, as far as possible, the appetites of the body.

Before Athanasius was twenty-four years of age he began his career as a controversial writer against the enemies of the truth and the orthodoxy of Christianity. While but a deacon he was sent to the council, since so celebrated in ecclesiastical history and theological controversies—the Council of Nice. It is said that his influence contributed in no small degree to the decrees against the Arians and other heretics. In A. D. 326—in his thirtieth year—Athanasius was made Bishop of Alexandria, then one of the principal centers of Christian learning and influence in the Roman world. As a Bishop he was faithful and exemplary, but from his bold and pronounced position as a believer, advocate and defender of the doctrine of the holy trinity he had incurred the implacable hate of the Arians. They made war upon him, and left no means in their power unemployed to break him down and utterly ruin him. Various charges were trumped up against him, such as murder, impurity and opposition to the government, all of which he at different times triumphantly repudiated. Through the Arians he was four times deposed from his bishopric, and once by Julian, the apostate, who feared the influence of his extraordinary zeal and activity—in all, five times he was deposed; and of the forty-six years of his official life he spent twenty in banishment, sometimes with a price set upon his head. At last, it is said, the Emperor Valens, through fear of the people, restored Athanasius to his people and his office. He is almost the first man in the empire who had created and consolidated a public opinion strong enough to control the imperial will. Athanasius was a man not only of eminent learning and ability, but of indomitable will as well. "Athanasius against the world" was once the watchword and battle shout of orthodoxy. He never in all his adversities, in his long and eventful career, compromised his principles or cringed to power.

He was quite a voluminous writer for those times, his published works making four volumes folio. These writings were mostly of a doctrinal and controversial character, being expositions and defenses of the Nicene creed touching the divinity and unity of Father, Son and Holy Ghost. Gregory of Nazianzus has an oration on Athanasius. He says that Athanasius' life supplied the place of sermons—that in him all ranks and orders might find something to admire. He says he was prayerful, praiseful, pure, humble, charitable, the friend of the poor, the steward of the rich, meek but zealous. In his discourses he excelled the eloquent, and in his practice those most used to business.

In his writings Athanasius brought against the Arians (who denied the divinity of Christ) and other heretics three classes of arguments: 1. From the authority of preceding writers, and the general sense of the church. 2. Philosophical and rational arguments. 3. Scriptural and exegetical proofs. In each of these fields, it is said by critics, he showed himself a master.

As a theologian he is perhaps most to be admired for his profound reverence and hearty submission to the teachings of the Holy Scripture. He sincerely believed the Scriptures, taught the existence of three eternal personalities (we have no other or better word,) co-equal in power and glory, as constituting in mysterious unity the one God. He held, and justly, that this is a mystery beyond the solution of finite minds. He believed it because he believed God himself had said so. He believed the revealed fact, but believed nothing as to the mode of this divine mystery. Arians, ancient and modern, object to the doctrine as absurd, and insist that Trinitarians believe a proposition like this: "That three feet are one foot;" but this is unjust. To use a part of the same illustration we may say we believe "three feet are one yard," but not one foot. So we believe that Father, Son and Holy Ghost are one God.

Athanasius spent the last six years of his life in peace, filling his episcopal office, dying in his seventy-sixth year, honored, loved and lamented. W.

Hinderances.

MR. EDITOR: It is sad to view the hinderances to the success of the gospel ministry. We are wont to venerate power in proportion to its greatness; and the greatness of the results which it achieves. In the world of arts and science we see the power of agencies at work controlling and appropriating steam and electricity, and we wonder with a sort of adoring reverence, and to the minds that wrought these inventions we attribute a sort of deified greatness. But what are these compared to the gospel, which is God's power—his means of saving the world? The gospel is a divine lever by which sinners are prized up out of the mire and clay, and placed upon a rock—the rock Christ. The gospel, as great as its power is, and as great as its achievements are, is committed unto men who are its dispensators, divinely appointed. Therefore the work of the minister is too great and its results too grand to be hindered, unless it be unavoidable.

There is no other work which hinderances interfere with so much as that of the minister. Disturb either his head or his heart, and you materially interfere with his work and prevent his success. Disturb his thoughts while in process of preparation for the pulpit, and they are as suddenly thrown out of their proper channel as a locomotive would be thrown from its track by a beetle of wood across it; and they are as difficult to get back again. No less will his work be hindered by disturbing the quiet of his soul, either by vexation or mortification. His sermons, instead of being warm, and full of sympathy and solicitude for sinners, are apt to be cold and sharp and harsh. Like hinderances which would interfere with the work of the minister would be no barrier in the way of the work of the husbandman or mechanic. A man can plow corn or hammer iron with his thoughts distracted and his soul vexed; but to preach requires a different spirit.

We are of the opinion, if there were no hinderances in the way of the gospel, and it was preached in its purity and power, as it might be, that it would not be long till even the heathen would be given to Christ, and the uttermost parts of the earth for a possession. O how far short do we come of preaching as efficiently as some others have, or as we ourselves occasionally have! What hinders us that we may not be uniformly successful?

Among other hinderances, we suppose that the chief object of satan is to hinder the gospel. Paul says that satan hindered him from going to Thessalonica to preach the gospel. The Savior warned Peter of his danger, because satan desired to have him; and poor Judas be victimized, and Judas is not alone. We believe that satan is an invisible intelligence, and, though not divine, possesses vast powers and capabilities; that he is waging a warfare against the best interests of the human family. We may also suppose that he directs his sharpest darts against the ministers of the gospel as his greatest antagonists.

We received a letter, a few days since, from a young man of promise, at college and preparing for the ministry, desiring advice and sympathy from us, saying that he was greatly tempted; that the thought of preaching had worried him till he was almost desperate. No wonder that satan should make a desperate effort to divert the purpose of that young man. He knew if he entered the ministry that his own kingdom would suffer loss. How often does he tempt ministers to doubt their call to the ministry! How often does he tempt them to quit the ministry, that its sacrifices are not required of them, and to engage in some occupation in life by which they can make a better support for themselves and families! How often are they discouraged and tempted to preach no more, because they see no fruits of their labors—sinners are not converted!

How much satan has to do with these temptations, who can tell? It is certain that they exist, and that the prospects of many a good man have been blighted and his usefulness destroyed by yielding to them. But happy for us that we are not ignorant of his device. The temptations of satan, however, are unavoidable, and must be overcome by a persistent resistance through grace.

There are other hinderances which ought not to be. J. P.

MANSFIELD, LA., March 13, 1875.

THE following, from the Nashville Christian Advocate, is applicable to our own paper, and expresses what we would most heartily urge upon the attention of our agents and subscribers:

"Our Terms of Subscription.—We are wearied with complaints about the advance of thirty cents in the terms of the Advocate, and are mortified to learn that in consequence of it our agents, in many cases, cannot get subscriptions to the paper. This is truly humiliating. It is a painful illustration of the defective character of the religion of the times. It seems incredible that a Christian should forego the pleasure and profit derived from the weekly perusal of his church journal on account of the paltry sum of thirty cents a year! and this, too, when all that is paid for the Advocate is appropriated to the support of the firm of which he himself is a partner! We have heard of biting one's nose off to spite his face; but we could hardly have thought that Methodists would perpetrate so great folly. We do hope our ministers—whatever they may think of the policy of raising instead of lowering the price, as demanded by many—will spare no pains to bring our recusant friends to view the matter in a reasonable light, and not allow the church and themselves to suffer so greatly for so trivial a matter. Now is the time, above all others, when thousands should be added to our subscription list, instead of being dropped from it. Let no effort be made without delay to recover those we have lost, and to double the number on our list. The Advocate will be extremely interesting during the coming season, and it was never before so important to all the interests of the church as at present.

A WAY TO HELP.—An Old Folks' concert is to be given at St. Patrick's Hall, in this city, on the night of April 13, for the benefit of Centenary College. There is a pretty large attendance of students at this institution, quite a number of them young men preparing for the ministry. As the college is without endowment, the pressure of the times is severely felt, and aid is imperatively required to enable the professors to go on with their labors. These Old Folks' concerts have been immensely popular, and we trust that the one to be given for Centenary will meet with encouragement from all the friends of education.

REV. DR. W. H. WATKINS, of the Mississippi Conference, has been on a brief visit to New Orleans. We hear that he preached an admirable sermon at Felicity Street on Sunday morning last. His son, John M. Watkins, graduated in medicine with high honors, and received his degree of M. D. at the commencement of the Medical College of Louisiana on Friday last.

MRS. ESTHER PRATT, widow of Daniel Pratt, died at her residence in Prattville, Alabama, February 15. This venerable woman was truly an elect lady, a model in all Christian graces and duties. Her death was peaceful. An obituary of the deceased will be found on our second page, from the pen of her pastor, Rev. J. W. Rush.

REV. C. K. MARSHALL, D. D., is on a visit to our city. He preached on Sunday night last at the Felicity Street church. He seems to have fully regained his health, and is as buoyant, vigorous and as full of sunshine as at any time during the last twenty years.

REV. PATRICK LANE, principal of the Institution for the Blind at Baton Rouge, gave us a call this week. Bro. Lane is engaged in a very important and benevolent work, and is eminently qualified for the responsible post which he occupies.

MOBILE DISTRICT CONFERENCE.—The preachers and delegates attending the Conference will pay full fare on the Pensacola and Louisville railroad coming, and receive from the superintendent here a free pass to return.

Those wishing to bring their wives and those coming by private conveyance will please inform me without delay. JOS. T. CURRY, P. C.

HARBIN'S COMBINED COTTON AND CORN PLANTER,

patented May 26, 1874, and now for the first time offered for sale in this city, is manufactured at Brady's Factory, corner St. Joseph and Fulton streets.

Parties desirous of examining this important adjunct to the planting interest will find it offered for sale at BRADY'S FACTORY, at A. BALDWIN & CO.'S large hardware house on Canal street, and by other prominent hardware firms in New Orleans.

This being the only Cotton Planter known that will separate the seed in planting, at the same time dropping, covering, harrowing and rolling the furrow, and with one horse and man saving the labor of five men and horses, it is with confidence that this great labor-saving invention is offered to the public.

The Corn attachment performs the same labor, dropping from one to eight seeds, as desired. mh18 1m

RED-TOP AND TIMOTHY.

BY LUCY LARCOM.

Red-Top and Timothy
Come here in the spring;
Light spears out of emerald sheaths
Everywhere they swing.
Harmless little soldiers,
On the field they play,
Nodding plumes and crossing blades
All the livelong day.

Timothy and Red-Top
Bring their music band;
Some with scarlet epaulettes,
Strutting stiff and grand;
Some in sky-blue jackets,
Some in vests of pink;
Black and white their leader's coat—
Restless Bob-o'-link!

Red-Top's airy feathers
Tremble to his notes,
As he sets himself an orchestra;
Then a thousand throats
Set the winds a-hanging,
While the saucy thing
Anywhere, on spike or spear,
Sways himself to sing.

Red-Top and Timothy
Have a mortal foe;
There's a giant with a scythe
Comes and lays them low;
Shuts them in barn-prisons;
Spares not even sweet clover;
Bob o'-link leads off his band,
Now the campaign's over.

Timothy and Red-Top
Will return again,
With familiar songs and flowers,
Through the April rain.
Though their giant foeman
Will not let them be,
One who swings a keener scythe
Cuts down such as he.

FOR THE ADVOCATE.

Grandpa Goodale Stories.—No. 4.

CONCERNING "TOAD-FROGS."

MY DEAR CHILDREN: The other night when I started to tell you the story about "How Barney Milked the Bays' Nest," and was interrupted, I noticed that Tom was very anxious to tell us something about toads. So now, before I begin the story, we will give him a chance to air his learning upon this most interesting subject.

"Now, grandpa," says Harry, "toads isn't an interesting subject at all. We'd a heap rather hear about 'How Barney Milked the Bays' Nest.'"

But, Harry, my boy, did you ever read about the Surinam toad?

"No, grandpa; but toads are great, ugly-looking things that give people warts."

"Not so," says Tom; "that's an exploded notion."

How is that, Tom? Do not the little lumps on the backs of toads contain a fluid that causes warts if it comes in contact with the skin?

"No, grandpa," Tom stoutly maintains. "My natural history says it causes a festering when it comes in contact with an abraided surface, but that it does not cause warts, as commonly supposed."

"I don't knew what that means," says Charlie.

Why, Charlie, it means that it will make your little hands sore if you get it on them where the skin is off, just as that red pepper made your eyes smart the other day when you got it in them, only it will last longer than the pepper smart did.

"Grandpa," says Harry, "I saw a big, ugly toad-frog trying to swallow a snake the other day."

Tom laughs at this, and says Harry has got it all wrong; that, in the first place, there is no such a thing as a "toad-frog," and, in the next place, it was the snake that was swallowing the toad, and not the toad that was swallowing the snake.

"No such a thing as a toad-frog!" exclaims Harry, indignantly. "Why, Tom, what are you thinking about? There are lots of them out in the garden, aren't there, graudpa?"

I think we will have to hear Tom on this subject. Can you tell us, Tom, the difference between a toad and a frog?

Tom, thus appealed to, looks very wise and says:

"Toads and frogs are both cold-blooded, anaurous, batrachian reptiles of the order amphibia; they are vertebrate, oviparous, without scales, and nocturnal in habit." But here Harry bursts in with:

"Now, Tom, you quit and let grandpa tell us about them. Who can understand all that lingo?"

You will have to explain it, Tom, as you go on. It is quite an accomplishment for a learned lad like you to talk so little folks can understand you.

Tom looks very wise, says he thinks any one might understand plain language like that, but condescends to explain.

"'Anaurous' means having no tail; 'batrachian' is merely the Greek name for 'frog;' 'reptile' means 'a creeping or crawling animal.'"

Tom evidently wants to get over this definition, but Harry is too quick for him, and interrupts with:

"But, Tom, toad-frogs don't crawl; they jump."

"I know they do," says Tom, "and some scientists have on this very account held that batrachians are not reptiles, but merely 'amphibia, which means living both on land and in the water. 'Vertebrate' means 'having a back-bone;' 'oviparous' means 'laying eggs,' and 'nocturnal in habit' means 'preferring the night for labor and the day for sleep.'"

That is very well, Tom. So your definition, so far, is "toads and frogs are animals that have spines, are cold-blooded, have no tails or scales, can live on land or in the water, lay eggs, and turn night into day."

"Why didn't you say so, Tom," says Harry, "instead of all that stuff which nobody can understand?"

But, Tom, you have not yet told us the difference between the toad and the frog.

"Why," continues Tom, "the very names point out the difference. 'Toad' means 'tardy,' and 'frog' means 'fractured' or 'broken,' because the frogs go in leaps, or their gait is 'broken' up into 'fragments.'"

Well, then, Tom, if that is so I think you will have to give up that the proper name for toads is "toad-frogs," or "slow leapers," for this describes their gait exactly.

But Tom maintains that the word "toad-frog" cannot be found in any work on natural history, or in any dictionary or cyclopedia, and he won't admit it, but proceeds to explain:

"Don't you see, frogs have longer hind legs and slenderer bodies than toads, and fewer warts. Why a dog will spit out a toad quick when he gets him into his mouth; but he will shake a frog till he kills him; besides, toads have no teeth and frogs have an upper set."

Do you boys want me to tell you about some toads I saw in South America once, with houses on their backs, and another kind that could sing almost as well as birds?

"Oh, yes, grandpa," says Charlie; "tell us about that," and the bright eyes sparkle, and the merry laugh I love so well, despite the deep furrows on my own face, flushes up the pretty, dimpled cheeks of my ever dear little ones.

Well, I will tell you about them if Tom will tell us whether the little green creature that gets up in the trees and croaks whenever it rains is a toad or a frog.

"It is a real frog," says Tom, "with well-marked teeth and long hind legs, but belongs to the family 'hyine,' and the name means 'sylvan,' or, as they are commonly called, 'tree-frogs.' Their toes are similar to the feet of a fly, and they walk on the under surface of a leaf, just as a fly can walk on the ceiling; they have a remarkable faculty of changing their color, and by this means often evade the pursuit of an enemy. I expect, grandpa, that the kind you used to see way down in Maine looked much more like a toad than the little green ones we have here in Louisiana, for my zoology says it is much larger and uglier."

You are quite right, Tom, and the Northern variety seems to be not only ugly, but fond of ugly things, for it is generally found on old dead trees and decaying fences and the like, and it can change its color so quickly that it is very hard to find; but it makes itself heard at night and in rainy weather for all that. But, Tom, you said the name "hyine" means "sylvan;" is there not a frog called the "sylvatica" or "wood-frog?"

"Oh, yes, grandpa, but that is of the 'ranidæ' family, and is much larger than the 'tree-frog.' Did you ever eat any frogs, grandpa?"

Oh, yes, quite often in Europe, and sometimes in this country. There are two kinds in our swamps that are very good. You needn't make such a face, Master Charlie; I can assure you that the hind quarters of a good fat bull-frog or shad-frog, either of them, are far superior to chicken. The "shad-frog" is called by some the "leopard-frog," from its beautiful spots. It is quite another affair to your "ugly toad," and can leap ten feet at a jump.

"But, grandpa, tell us about the toads with houses on their backs, and toads that can sing."

Oh, yes; I saw them in South America in 1836. The toads with houses on their backs are called "Surinam toads," because they are found chiefly in Surinam or Dutch Guiana, and in the marshes along a river of the same name. But I see that mamma is coming for you, little ones, and we will have to finish to-morrow night.

"Mamma oughtn't to tum," says Charlie. GRANDPA GOODALE.

Indian Post Carriers.

In the East Indies the postmen are known as tappal-runners. In general they are an honest, humble class of people. Their pay is small, and labor and fatigue often great, especially in those districts where there are wide jungles, and where the heavy falls of rain during one part of the year render traveling not only toilsome, but full of danger.

Nor is the weather the only enemy these poor people have to encounter; swollen streams with strong rapids, venomous serpents and fierce wild beasts—these are an every-day occurrence with those who carry the letter-bags in the districts that lie near the Malabar coast. Armed with a long pole, at one end of which are suspended the sealed bags, while the other has a number of brass rings, which, tinkling together, serve to alarm serpents and other unwelcome neighbors, these tappal-runners, usually two or three in number, set out at all hours of the night, and face sometimes the most fearful storms. This, in a dense jungle or wood, is anything but a desirable position; for, although they are always accompanied by torch-bearers, one going before and the other following them, and although the whole company assist in raising a continued unearthly yell, which is intended to terrify the fierce beasts of the forest, it often happens that some sudden winding among the hills brings these poor tappal-runners into the midst of trumpeting elephants, bellowing bisons, half-frightened tigers, or hissing cobra di capellos.

In this state of affairs the torch-bearer who closes in the rear gives the alarm, and the flaming torches are the only safeguard. The tappal-runners continue in motion, running all the faster in consequence of what they have just witnessed. The jungle is got through, the moon bursts forth from a heavy ridge of storm clouds, and they reach their journey's end just as the day is breaking in the east. Having delivered over the letter-bags to those appointed to receive them, they gladly turn in, weary and wet, for a few hours' refreshing nap. To-morrow night the letters going in an opposite direction will arrive, and then they will return home again, and have a week's rest from the toil and perils of tappal-carrying in the jungle.—Child's Companion.

THE vocation of the Christian scholar is, in our day, indefinitely noble; but demanding gifts and graces of no common kind for its adequate fulfillment, and imposing a burden which none but those who are strengthened from within and from above can long support. But he who is conscious of any measure of such strength, and knows how it may be increased according to his need, will never attempt to get rid of responsibility by turning aside from duty, or hope for peace only by avoiding light.—Myers.

Farm, Garden and Household.

The Secret of the Potato Disease.

Prof. de Bary, of Strasburg, the investigators in France, Rev. J. M. Berkley, and other scientists of England, and many in America, have labored diligently during a period of thirty years to discover the origin and true cause of this malady. The utmost they have discovered by their researches and experiments is that "fungus" is found upon the vines; and their theory is that disease originates from this parasitical growth, and that from its attack and continued presence rust in the vines and rot in the tubers follow.

The idea that fungus originates the potato disease is a fallacy. The fungi never start spontaneously from a healthy plant or substance. They are exhalations from a purulent, morbid condition of the plant or substance from which they start and derive their nourishment. Fungus is a consequence and not the cause of the disease.

My experiments and microscopic examinations of the potato reveal wonderful inherent substances—eggs of insects developing organisms never described by entomologists as connected with the potato, nor referred to in any of the early or later scientific investigations. They have entirely overlooked the hidden enemy, the secret source, where and from whence the potato disease originates. I furnish the following facts: For years past I have taken different varieties of potatoes, washed and actually scrubbed them thoroughly with a stiff brush. These potatoes, being subsequently submitted to the element of warmth—same as when planted—develop, after a few weeks, myriads of living microscopic (larvæ) insects. The epidermis of the tuber, examined with the microscope, show at this time the eggs of the insects; also their embryonic state in various stages of development. They appear to be protected by a gluten until warmth and moisture dissolve the adhesive substance which first fastened them to the epidermis. Myriads of this larvæ come into existence from the potatoes planted, leave their nidus (nest,) and adhere suctorially to the roots for subsistence, thereby poisoning the vines and destroying their vitality. Blight in the vines and rot in the tubers follow.

Potatoes from England, Scotland, Ireland, France, Germany, Prussia and other countries, all, by experiment and microscopic investigations, show the same results.

Those foreign tubers contain inherently the eggs of the larvæ, and the same elementary action that develops the stalk and roots brings to life these deadly enemies of the crops.

The insects are always semi-aquatic in this larva state, and remain during this period of existence upon the roots and new tubers.

Statistics from agricultural districts of various countries show an aggregate loss of hundreds of millions of dollars in the potato crop annually. England reports a loss of $200,000,000 by the potato disease of 1872. And yet England, and all Europe combined, with scientists in entomology and microscopy unsurpassed, have never traced out the underground rendezvous where the enemy are reserved for their annual campaign of destruction.—Lyman Reed.

STACKING SHEAVES OF GRAIN.—Unless a stacker is an expert it will always be better to set a pole firmly in the ground and build the stack around it. A pole at the center will aid the stacker to carry up his work true, and it will prevent a stack from leaning. When commencing a stack bottom, the Ohio Farmer says, set up two bundles against each other, and others against these until a circle is formed sloping from center to circumference, each row half the length of a sheaf further out than the one before it. Carry out the foundation in this way until it is of the desired size, and then at the outside lay a double row of bundles and press them down well. The foundation being now prepared, build upon it by laying the tiers of sheaves from outside toward the center, each row lapping butts to bands. Gradually lay out until the stack has attained the height desired—that is, let each row of buts project a trifle further than the one beneath, so that the circumference of the stack will gradually increase in size as it is carried up to a half-way point, and then gradually draw in until the top is reached. Caution must be used not to make the stack too flaring. We have found it a good plan to let one tier of bundles project some four inches at the point where it is decided to begin drawing in for the top; this furnishes what may be termed eaves. If the stack is to stand an indefinite time before threshing, it will pay to give considerable attention to thatching the top. At all events it should have a topping out of bog grass or hay.

THE AYRSHIRE COW.—Formerly farming was so poor in Scotland that in spring the people bled their cattle to get blood to mix with a little oat and meal. So much of the land was wet and swampy that but little could be cultivated. Wheat was seldom grown except on a nobleman's estate, and a large portion of the country was as much in common as are the Western plains. And yet the grass was rich and abundant, and so it came to pass, between 1750 and 1800, that the celebrated Ayrshire cow grew out of this distress—that is to say, some family, surely pressed for the means to sustain life, had a cow which they cared for, both winter and summer, with the greatest attention; she was driven to the richest and thickest grass, she was housed in winter with the children, and fed from the carefully stored hay; and above all, she was milked till the last possible drop was obtained. From kindness, good feed and close milking a calf sprung equal at least to its mother. Then began neighborhood fame; perhaps the laird or the noble obtained some of the stock, and the same care being bestowed, followed by "selection of the fittest," a noble race growing out of the direst necessity has been given to the world. I may note here that no valuable race of cattle has ever been known to originate except in a country of excellent grass.—Dr. Cross.

TRAINING A HORSE TO TROT.—A correspondent of the Turf, Field and Farm tells how he trained an old cavalry horse to trot. He was accustomed to "lope," and could not be made to understand what was required of him, until a space of some four hundred yards was measured off in a field, and he was ridden across this. Whenever he broke he was scolded, at once turned about and again started from the starting-point. If he trotted across without breaking he was petted, fed lumps of sugar, apples or some other pleasant food. In this way he soon learned what was wanted, and made every effort to trot this distance in the shortest time, becoming a horse of unusual speed. A somewhat similar plan was some years since set forth in a circular and sold at one dollar.

We refer to this now, not so much because of the desirability of knowing how to teach a horse to trot, as because the lesson taught can be applied in very many ways. Teaching any domestic animals what is expected of them is of the greatest importance. If an animal knows that a specific duty is required, to be followed by rest or reward, it will much more readily do what is expected than if it has no definite conception of what is before it.

SPAVIN—Is It Curable?—This question is asked in the Western Farmer, and answered by its veterinary editor, William Horne, as follows:

"No; spavin is not curable—never was, never will be—the many quack assertions to the contrary notwithstanding. At this advanced period of information and knowledge in all such and similar matters a man shows himself behind the times when the question of curability of spavin is not with him a settled fact as an incurable disease. I have been so often asked if spavin or ringbone can be taken off that I am impatient when such a question is asked. Neither can be cured, but may be so mitigated that the horse may be just as useful as though the exostosis of spavin or ringbone did not exist.

"The surest and with me the best remedy is the actual cautery (hot iron) in the hands of a qualified man—none other. The next remedy is active blistering with the common cantharides blister ointment, or biniodide of mercury or iodine ointment, or strong tincture of iodine, applied for several weeks; but firing is the best by far, and most effective."

FOOD FOR PIGS.—There is no doubt in our mind of the benefit from feeding crude carbonaceous matter to swine when they are kept in close pens. The avidity with which hogs eat rotten wood is well known. Charcoal is but another form. The utility of feeding wood has long been recognized. We some years since substituted the ordinary Western stone coal with the best results, where from two hundred to five hundred hogs were kept in close pens, on the refuse of city hotels. Something of the kind seems as necessary to them as salt to herbivorous animals. We have known them to consume a pound in the course of a day, and again they would not seek the coal for some time. Just what the particular use coal is in the animal economy is not so easy to answer. Swine are especially liable to scrofulous and inflammatory diseases. Carbon, in the shape of coal, is an antiseptic, and the probability is that it acts in this way in purifying the blood.

WHEAT-GROWING MAXIMS.—Somebody has been at the trouble of condensing a great deal of information about wheat-growing in a very small compass, and somebody else set it afloat without credit. If we could we would gladly give the name of the author.

The best soil for wheat is a rich clay loam.

Wheat likes a good, deep, soft soil.

The best seed is plump, heavy, oily and clean.

About two inches is the best depth for sowing the seed.

The drill puts in the seed better and cheaper than broadcasting.

From the middle of September to the last of October is the best time for sowing.

If drilled, one bushel of seed per acre; if broadcasted, two bushels are required.

One heavy rolling after sowing does much good.

For flour, cut when the grain begins to harden; for seed, not until it has hardened.

FRUIT IN TIN CANS.—The Boston Journal of Chemistry says: "The impression prevails among those who use freely fruit which is put up in tin cans that they are injured thereby; and this impression, in many instances, is correct. We have long contended that all preserved fruits and vegetables should be stored in glass, and that no metal of any kind should be brought in contact with them. All fruits contain more or less vegetable acids; and others that are highly corrosive are often formed by fermentation, and the metallic vessels are considerably acted upon. Tin cans are held together by solder, an alloy into which lead enters largely. This metal is easily corroded by vegetable acids, and poisonous salt formed. Undoubtedly many persons are greatly injured by eating tomatoes, peaches, etc., which had been placed in tin cans; and we advise our friends to use only glass jars."

SWEET POTATOES.—After vines commence running you may clip them off, cut them up in pieces about a foot long, and stick half the length in the ground, and they will make just as good potatoes as the slips. This may be done as late as the middle of July. You may plant the potato in March, draw and plant the slips in April and May, and then draw and cut the vines in June, and raise a good crop from them all. Keep on planting sweet potatoes; they don't interfere much with any other crop, and will take the place of corn for feeding all kinds of stock in winter.—Brandon Republican.

MEDICAL PREPARATIONS.

The Perfection of Medical Science.

Dr. Warrington's Cough Melange.

☞ Pronounced by all who have used it the very best preparation for the cure of CONSUMPTION, Coughs, Colds, Bronchitis, Hoarseness, Asthma, Whooping Cough, Chronic Coughs, Catarrh, Influenza, Spitting of Blood, Soreness and Tightness of the Breast and Lungs, Night Sweats and Croup. Being prepared from Herbs, Tar and Rock Candy, it is healing, softening and expectorating, and particularly suitable for the cure of all affections of the Throat and Lungs. ☞ Parents will please remember that the Cough Melange is the only sure remedy for Croup.

Full directions accompany each bottle. Price, per bottle, $1, or six bottles for $5.

Dr. Warrington's Analectic Oil.

THE GREAT PAIN DESTROYER.

It Cures the Worst Pain in from Three to Thirty Minutes.

THE GREATEST REMEDY IN THE WORLD for Cholera, Cramps, Diarrhœa, Colic, Headache, Neuralgia, Toothache, Scalds, Bilious Colic, Children's Colic, Cholera Infantum, Sick Headache, Nervousness, Nervous Headache, Summer Complaint of Children, Cuts, Sprains and Bruises. Used internally and externally.

As a remedy for Rheumatism it has no equal.

The Analectic Oil is prepared from the most active vegetable remedies. It acts directly on the nervous system, and by restoring the nervous equilibrium it regulates the excretions and secretions of the body. It is also a powerful diffusive stimulant.

For infants we challenge the world for its equal. It can be administered to infants one week old for Colic or Cramp. Dose, one-half drop to two drops, under three months old; and between three months and one year, two to five drops, in a teaspoonful of milk or water.

☞ REMEMBER. ☜

No preparation equals the Analectic Oil for Cholera, Diarrhœa and Cholera Morbus. Try it and be convinced.

Full directions accompany each bottle. Price, $1 per bottle, or six bottles for $5.

RENOVATING BITTERS!!

Purify the Blood.

STRENGTHEN, INVIGORATE AND RENOVATE SYSTEM.

One of the best remedies known for the speedy cure of

DYSPEPSIA,

Loss of Appetite, Sour Stomach, Flatulence, Heartburn, Nausea, Fluttering of the Heart, Fainting Sensations, Sudden Flushes of Heat, Depression of Spirits or Melancholy, Water Brash, and Chronic or Nervous Debility. They are Diuretic, Tonic, Alterative and Stimulant. They perfectly eradicate all Bilious disorders arising from a foul stomach, strengthening the system and regulating the functions of the Liver.

Any one suffering with Weak Nerves, Deranged Liver, Kidney Complaint, Loss of Appetite, Fever and Ague, or any of the diseases or symptoms enumerated above, can be materially benefited and entirely cured by the use of these Bitters.

FOR FEMALES.

It is an established fact that fully one-half of the females are in bad health; or, in other words, never feel well. Many suffer with inward weakness. They feel languid, devoid of energy, extremely nervous, and have no appetite. To this class the Renovating Bitters are especially recommended. Such patients should resort to the use of these Bitters, the invariable result of which will be a strong and healthy constitution, a disappearance of all nervousness, a good appetite and a perfect restoration to health.

Thousands have testified to the merits of these Bitters. I would strongly advise all suffering with the above-named complaints to try them and be convinced.

Full directions accompany each bottle. Price, $1 per bottle, or six bottles for $5.

☞ Ask your druggist for either of the above medicines, and if he does not have it he will send and get it for you; or can be sent by Express to any part of the United States by addressing

Scientific.

A FRENCH NATURALIST, M. Margelidet, has just published the results of an interesting experiment in natural history. On the fifteenth of January, in the year 1870, he caused a cavity to be hollowed in a large stone; put a toad into the cavity, and then sealed up the mouth of the cavity with impermeable cement. The other day, on the fifteenth of that month, five years, day for day, since he had put the poor creature into durance vile, he broke open the cavity, at the Museum of Natural History, and found the toad within alive and well, though in a torpid condition. Nor has it, since its release, taken any nourishment whatever.

THE STRUCTURE OF PLANTS.—Dr. Braithwaite has investigated the structure of plants, the interdependence of the several parts, the various forms of cells, and the phenomena of growth, and has discovered what any sincere worker may discover—that there is always something fresh to find out in the products of nature. As regards cells, the doctor remarks, each variety is so constructed as best to fulfill its special function. "Where freedom and quickness of circulation are required, as in the milk vessels of such plants as the sow-thistle, lettuce and celandine, the walls are thin, and all obstructing partitions are removed; on the other hand, where strength is needed, as in so many fibers used in our manufactures, deposit goes on in the interior until hardly any central space is left; and if firmness and resistance are required this deposit becomes so indurated as to give the qualities we value in such woods as oak, mahogany, box and ebony; while even in them provision is made for interchange of air and fluids by a beautiful system of pores and canals."

EFFECT OF LIGHTNING ON TREES. A Swiss savant named Colladon has made some interesting observations in regard to the effect produced on different kinds of trees by lightning. In the neighborhood of Geneva lake, where these observations were made, the poplar-tree suffers least from lightning, seeming to conduct it away rapidly. Oaks, when struck, lose the tops. Elms are as little injured as poplars. Colladon has found that young pear-trees recover from the effects of lightning, but old ones die, which seems to be a proof that young trees are better conductors. The practical conclusion that he draws from this is that poplar-trees may serve for lightning rods when planted near houses, provided care be taken to connect the lower part of the trunk with a well or moist ground, by means of a strong metal plate buried in the earth. Without this precaution the electric current may leave the tree and take another direction. This happened in one case, where it took an oblique course through a house in order to reach a neighboring puddle. If the ground water is not very deep, this is not necessary, as on river banks and in valleys.—Journal of Applied Chemistry.

AN INVENTION has been patented in England by Mr. T. Harding, which is intended to prevent the entrance into dwellings of sewer gas. Connected with the main sewer is a pipe two inches in diameter, and at the top of the pipe is a ball, so fixed that it allows an aperture of a quarter of an inch all round, through which the sewer gas may escape from the pipe. Running up outside of the large pipe is an ordinary gas pipe, and just underneath the ball at the top of the sewer pipe a set of burners is so arranged that when lighted they make a complete circle of fire. The ball prevents the sewer gas from rising through the center, and it cannot escape through the flame, which entirely surrounds the aperture. The consequence is that the sewer gas mingles with the ordinary gas, and is consumed, adding, it is said, greatly to the brilliancy of the flame. The invention may be easily applied to the public lamps, and we are informed that a one-inch pipe may be used, and that the increase in the illuminating power that would be thus gained is enormous. Another advantage is that the ball and the upper part of the pipe quickly get intensely hot, and the heat draws the foul air from the sewers, leaving them perfectly free.

THE sixth and concluding lecture of the course on chemistry by Dr. Frankland, F. R. S., to working men in connection with the Royal School of Mines, was delivered lately. Subject: Water. The lecturer said: "People usually imagine that they know all about water perfectly well; but, in truth, we are very far from knowing all about it; a whole course of lectures would not be sufficient to go through all the known properties of water. We will look at a few of its principal qualities: First, as to its color; doubtless you would say, if asked, that water is colorless, and so it appears to be when you look only at a thin stratum; but looked at in a stratum of sufficient depth it will be seen that water has its own peculiar color—a bluish green tint. This we show by passing a ray of white light from the electrical lamp through a horizontal tube, which is fifteen feet long and half filled with pure water from the laboratory, and you see the light, passing through the air in the top of the tube on to the screen, is white; that through the water has a bluish-green tint. This layer corresponds to a reservoir seven and a half feet deep, and a stratum of pure water of that depth would give this color. Another quality of water is its comparative incompressibility; it was doubted for a very long time whether it was compressible at all, and the celebrated Florence experiment did not settle the question; but it has been shown that it is slightly compressible, that, for one additional atmosphere, 1,000,000 volumes of water are compressed to the extent of 51.3 volumes."

THE festival of St. Januarius was celebrated, according to custom, at Naples recently, but this year, the Italian newspapers inform us, the blood remained firm in its phial, and showed no signs of liquefaction.

THE EIGHTH WONDER OF THE WORLD IS THE LADY CHEAP JOHN,
MRS. D. J. LOEWENSTEIN,
519.....MAGAZINE STREET.....519
Who has sold out her damaged stock of BOOTS, SHOES AND HATS, and is receiving an extensive stock of NEW GOODS, now arriving direct from the best manufacturers of the North, East and West. Having been carefully selected for this market, and bought for cash, they will be sold at astonishingly low prices—not to be beaten in this city. Then come and see the wonder, which will cost nothing, but you will carry away more Shoes and Boots, for less money, than you imagine. Do not fail to come. Look out for the sign of the WHITE LION. Orders from the country promptly attended to. de17 10m

FOUR SEASONS RESTAURANT.—JOHN ROSIO, proprietor of this old and favorite house, announces to his friends that he has removed to No. 111 Chartres street, between St. Louis and Conti streets, where, with enlarged premises and increased facilities, he will give them the best the market affords, at the same low prices as heretofore. Private Dining-Rooms up stairs. Also comfortably furnished rooms at reasonable rates. Thankful for the liberal patronage bestowed upon him in the past, he asks for a continuance of the same favors. ja21 3m

Total	6,706

On Saturday, although at the opening there was nothing in the dispatches to stimulate the demand, buyers came forward with increased spirit, and the movement being subsequently stimulated by the noon New York telegram reporting an advance of ⅛c. in spots, with an improvement of 1-16@⅛c. in futures, the sales up to 1 P. M. reached 2,500 bales, after which there were further transactions to the extent of 3,750 bales, making the comparatively large aggregate of 6,250 bales. On Monday only a moderate business was done during the morning, but later in the day, spots having advanced ⅛c. at New York, and the receipts at the ports showing a further falling off, buyers came forward more freely, and the entire business summed up 5,700 bales, at an improvement of ⅛c. in ordinary and strict ordinary, and 1-16@⅛c. in the medium and better qualities. The lower grades were in special request, and improved more than the higher. The sales included barely strict ordinary at 14c., good ordinary at 14⅛@14⅜c., and strict good ordinary at 15c. On Tuesday there was a fair inquiry, and 2,000 bales changed hands during the morning, at about previous rates, after which buyers came forward more freely and took in addition 3,300 bales, making a total for the day of 5,301 bales. Nothing transpired to indicate any quotable variation.

The above makes an aggregate for the past three days of 19,250 bales, against 15,950 for the corresponding time last week and 12,550 the week before.

The receipts proper at this port since the first of September, exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas, are 967,414 bales, against 1,076,284 bales to the same date last year, and the decrease in the receipts at all the ports up to the latest mail dates, as compared with last year, is 180,388 bales. The decrease by the reports per telegraph is 173,920—3,148,415 against 3,322,335. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same date last year, there is an increase of 48,996 bales to Great Britain, and a decrease of 35,705 to France and 52,457 to other foreign ports. We quote:

SHADINES—SHADINES.

TO THE PUBLIC.

Five years since, after previous years of experience in the propagation and preservation of Shadines, or young Shad, we first introduced our fish to the American people.

Shadines are put up in hermetically-sealed tin boxes, perfectly boneless, in a mild, pleasing, appetizing sauce, palatable to all, free from oil (so objectionable in sardines,) retaining only the natural richness of the shad, and ready for the table at all times—for dinner, lunch or evening meal—by merely opening the box. A daily want for every family during Lent.

Bear in mind, we are the original and only packers of Shadines, and every genuine box has the letters H. & C. pressed on each side.

News of the Week.

DOMESTIC.

WASHINGTON, March 24.—The Senate was in executive session all day, most of the time being spent in discussing the nomination of Don A. Pardee to be United States district judge of Louisiana, vice Durell, resigned. The nomination was finally laid on the table.

A committee was then appointed to wait upon the President and inform him that the Senate was ready to adjourn, unless he had some further communication to make. The President replied that he had none.

The usual resolution of thanks to the Vice President and President pro tem. of the Senate were agreed to, and the Senate, at 5.45 P. M., adjourned sine die.

Apprehensions from floods and gorges are general throughout the North, the late severe weather having massed the ice. The present snow, melting in many localities as it falls, gives assurance of a general flood.

Two hundred thousand people who subsist from the lumber trade will probably lose all.

GALVESTON, March 26.—A special to the News from Corpus Christi, dated the twenty-sixth, eight P. M., says: "A large body of armed Mexicans attacked several ranches about seven miles from this city this evening, robbed one store, taking several Americans prisoners. An invasion of this city is apprehended. The excitement is intense; all the citizens are in arms."

GALVESTON, March 27.—A News special from Corpus Christi, March 27, says: The band of Mexicans come within seven miles of town, robbed several stores and houses, and took a large number of Americans prisoners, among them Judge Gilpin, formerly a member of the Legislature, and two women. They compelled all the captives to walk in front of them until they were exhausted, then mounted some of them on bareback horses and hurried them off. They robbed and burned the postoffice at Nueces, and robbed and took prisoner one mail-rider. The Texans have gone in pursuit.

A fight is reported near Banquette; one Mexican and two Americans killed. All except four persons escaped. Nothing has been heard of them. Business is mostly suspended and citizens are under arms guarding the town. Information received from Los Olmes, Nueces county, says that throughout the entire region between here and the Rio Grande lawless bands from Mexico are continually raiding through the country, robbing, murdering and driving stock across the river. They have become so daring of late that nearly all travel on the highway has ceased; even stock men are deterred from hunting their cattle and horses through fear of falling into the hands of these ruffians.

They entertain an especial enmity to Americans, and woe to the luckless white man that falls into their clutches. At present there seems to be a concerted movement on the part of these villains to clean up all the white men within striking distance of the Rio Grande—fifty to seventy-five miles—and even further, where ingress and egress can be safely effected. To this end they have been crossing the river in small detachments for the past week, and it is estimated that there are now on Texas soil at least three hundred armed bandits.

Rumor hath it that several Americans near the river have been murdered by them.

The rumor comes in that the Mexicans have cleaned out a company or two of negro soldiers at San Luis, on the Rio Grande, about forty miles below Rio Grande City, and a number of armed men were seen hovering near this place. A great many Mexicans reside here, but they cannot be depended upon for assistance in a contest in which their countrymen are engaged.

Nearly the entire Rio Grande frontier of Texas, embracing a belt of from fifty to one hundred miles in width, is inhabited mostly by Mexicans, many of whom, though taking no active part in the forays of the thieves, yet sympathize with and give them secret aid and comfort.

WASHINGTON, March 28.—The matter of the Louisiana judgeship may be considered closed. Attorney General Williams has telegraphed Circuit Judge Wood that he cannot designate a district judge for Louisiana.

MAUCH CHUNK, March 29.—Intelligence reached here at nine o'clock last night of a threatened outbreak of frenzied miners from several mines. They moved simultaneously from several points; disarmed the special police from Philadelphia at Buck mountain, and took their arms with them. They went to Jindle, where one policeman was shot in the head and two were beaten. Each place they visited they compelled the men to go with them. No damage was done to property as far as Hazleton. Father O'Hara, Catholic priest, exhorted them to go home, and they are now disbanding. Should the troubles continue the government will be called on for troops. All quiet now, but threatening.

WASHINGTON, March 30.—In the Supreme Court to-day the case of the United States against Cruikshank and others, charged with a violation of the enforcement act in Grant parish, Louisiana, was taken up, and its argument will likely consume the remainder of the week. It comes to this court by certificate of division from the Circuit Court for Louisiana. Judge Bradley, of this court, was of the opinion that the act of 1870, under which the indictment is framed, is unconstitutional, and his colleague at the circuit was of the reverse opinion. The defendants are represented by Reverdy Johnson, David Dudley Field, John A. Campbell, and Judge Marr, of Louisiana.

It is likely that the Supreme Court, by advice and consent of counsel, will withhold decision in United States vs. Cruikshank et al. until October.

FOREIGN.

BERLIN, March 25.—The government contemplates an amendment of the law against the Jesuits, so as to make it operative against other religious orders.

PARIS, March 25.—According to the latest advices from Carlist headquarters at Estella, Generals Mendiri, Sabolls and Tristary have united in a forcible protest against General Cabrera's manifesto and in favor of Alfonso.

MADRID, March 25.—General Compos has inflicted another defeat on the Carlists at Huguet, near Ridaura. The enemy lost three hundred and the Alfonsists sixty-eight killed. The Carlists are concentrating for an attack on Puigcerda.

CITY OF MEXICO, March 22, via Havana, March 30.—The seventh National Congress will begin its closing session on April 1.

A floor in St. Paul's Hospital, in this city, recently gave way and a large number of people were precipitated to the story below. Several persons were badly injured.

A new law compels the closing of pawn offices in the capital. The proprietors generally refuse to conform.

The earthquakes in Jalisco are abating, the later shocks being very slight. Meanwhile the volcanic activity of Ceburuco increases, and prodigious quantities of ashes and dense volumes of smoke issue from its crater.

PARIS, March 30.—An official decree has been promulgated prohibiting the importation into France of American potatoes, and of sacks or barrels previously used in packing them. The object is to prevent the introduction of the Colorado beetle.

Weather Freaks in Arkansas, Etc.

MR. EDITOR: The following notes, derived from reliable sources, indicate approximately the changes that occurred in the weather in Sebastian county, Arkansas, recently:

Friday, March 5, 1875.—Quite warm and clear; trees budding rapidly, birds singing, insects flying, musquitoes biting, farmers plowing, gardeners planting, etc.

Saturday, March 6.—Snowed all day, on a warm, melting earth. Depth of snow at the city of Fort Smith, four inches; at Enterprise, ten miles south of Fort Smith, eight inches; over Backbone mountain, five miles farther south, twelve inches; at Bishops', in an open prairie twenty-four miles south of Fort Smith, fourteen inches deep; over Poteau mountain, thirty miles south of Fort Smith, in Scott county, eighteen inches deep. Don't know how deep in Texas and Louisiana.

Sunday, March 7.—Clear, bright and sunny. Most of the snow left in the northern part of the county, and in a day or two more spring returned.

Our State is very quiet under the benign government instituted by the best people in it, with Hon. A. H. Garland as the lawful and worthy Governor. Bread is scarce in many counties, and thousands of people will live hard. But we hope they will "trust in the Lord and do good," so as to "dwell in the land and be fed." The church is holding on in the even tenor of her way; nothing very unusual being done any way. We hope and pray for peace, prosperity and a general religious revival this year. The NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE always meets with a hearty welcome.

H. M. GRANADE.

From the Work.

ST. STEPHEN'S AND WASHINGTON MISSION.—Mr. Editor: Our first quarterly meeting closed yesterday. It lasted two days. Bro. Cox, our presiding elder, did the most of the preaching, which was greatly to the satisfaction and edification of the people. We received one person into the church on application. The greater part of the community has been quickened and revived on the subject of religion.

MARCH 15, 1875.

ALWAYS have a book within your reach which you may catch up at your odd minutes. Resolve to edge in a little reading every day, if it is but a single sentence. If you can give fifteen minutes every day it will be felt at the end of the year. Regulate your thoughts when not at study. A man is thinking even while at work. Let him think well.

WERE a man but to think of it, the responsibility of not acting is sometimes infinitely greater than that of the most rash act.—Maudsley.

Further Particulars of the Awful Devastation.

The tornado of Saturday was probably the most terrible in its ravages and extent that has ever visited this section of the country. During Sunday it was the subject of conversation in this and neighboring cities among all classes, and there was a general desire to learn the fullest particulars. Augusta was remarkably fortunate in escaping the ravages of it.

The first place that we hear of its striking was Atlanta, where it was rather severe, though only a portion of the city suffered by it. It struck the western part of the city early in the day, followed about one o'clock by a destructive hail-storm.

Large hail-stones seem to have fallen at all the places visited by the storm, and scenes of desolation mark its track through Georgia and into South Carolina. Trees were uprooted and twisted off, houses of all kinds demolished, heavy cars overthrown, while, saddest of all, many persons were killed and injured by the falling buildings, and some even carried long distances on the wings of the wind. In the southern portion of Augusta large pieces of bark from trees, which it is known do not grow within many miles of this city, fell to the ground during the heavy rains and were picked up by different persons. The effects of the heavy rains are seen in all directions of the city, where crossings were washed up and in some cases floated off. In many places it appeared as though there had been a freshet from the river, the water being very deep in all low places. This was especially noticeable where the side drains to the sewers were not sufficiently large to carry off the water at once. It seems like Augusta escaped by a special Providence.

At Berzelia there were two heavy rain-storms coming from different directions at different times during the afternoon—one from the north-west and the other from the north-east. During the first one various articles fell, and were picked up, such as hats, bed linen, boards and shingles, and others of a varied character, which were known to have come from a distance of many miles. The force of the wind was so great in the track of the cyclone that horses and mules were blown almost away, and in a few instances men, women and children are reported to have been carried hundreds of yards; and in one case a child carried away, it is said, has not been found, and in another instance a young lady in Hancock county was said to have been landed in the top of a pine-tree and so severely injured that she cannot live. Another report yesterday was that a man, a stranger, had been lodged in a tree up the Georgia railroad, and that no one knew whence he came or anything about him. But these two latter reports lack confirmation.

The following are the particulars of the ravages of the storm and casualties, as far as obtainable up to yesterday evening:

After leaving Atlanta, the next place we hear of the tornado is near Sparta, where it struck about noon.

About five miles from Sparta the house of Mr. Sandford Massey was totally destroyed, and Mrs. Massey and her child were killed. A young lady named Miss Berry, who was visiting at this house, was also killed, and Mr. Massey had his foot broken.

At Elam Baptist church, in Warren county, not far from Barnett, on the Georgia railroad, there was a meeting in progress, Rev. J. W. Ellington preaching to a large congregation when the storm reached there. The building was demolished, and a number of persons injured and one lady killed.

AT MILLEDGEVILLE.

The Macon Telegraph and Messenger says the clouds, as they passed over, resembled an hour-glass in shape, and were so luminous as to create the impression that a large fire had occurred, and the fire bells were generally rung. Fully fifteen houses were destroyed, but a full list could not be obtained. There are no doubt many others not heard from. The new building of Mr. Martin was destroyed, and one of his children and a colored child killed. Judge Hunter's residence was unroofed, and the carriage-house of Mr. T. H. Latimer, with his stables, were destroyed. A bale of cotton was blown to pieces, and a team passing from the asylum to Milledgeville was overtaken, the wagon blown away, and the harness torn from the animals, severely injuring them.

In Glasscock county the force of the storm is said to have been terrible, and that fully thirty-five persons were killed, showing that the worst effects were felt in this county. We have not yet obtained a report of the casualties at this point. Judging from the general course of the storm, this was probably the point where it diverged, and one portion struck Camak, the station on the Georgia railroad where the Macon and Augusta railroad branches off for Macon. This appeared to be a regular cyclone—a whirlwind within a whirlwind, as in the case of this one, at times arising from the earth high in the air, then shooting downward to the earth again and carrying everything before it. This was especially exemplified at Camak, where the tornado swooped down and literally swept the whole of the village away, not leaving a single house of any kind standing.

As we reported on Sunday morning, Mr. Thomas Geesling, the Georgia railroad night watchman, was killed by a car, containing ten tons of guano, under which he took refuge, turning over on him. Mr. S. B. Fielding, telegraph operator; Mr. T. C. Kneller, conductor on the Macon and Augusta railroad; Mr. Edward Skinner and Mr. Albert Tunisen, both firemen, all of whom were at Camak at the time and previously reported injured, were doing well yesterday, as we learned. It is strange that, in the prostration of all the houses at Camak, ten or twelve in number, so few were injured. This may be accounted for, however, by the fact that the inmates generally ran out into the open air upon the first premonition of danger.

The most fortunate escapes, however, were the passenger trains of the Macon and Augusta railroad and the Georgia railroad, the latter being only twenty minutes behind the storm, while the trains of the former road, bound up and down, missed it only by an hour. The train for Macon reached Camak with great difficulty, while the down day passenger train of the Georgia railroad was delayed two hours in clearing the track of the debris, trees, telegraph poles, wires, etc. The residents of this section are houseless and homeless, having lost all they had in their houses—clothing carried off, provisions destroyed, and no place where they can lay their heads. The storm seemed to cross the Georgia railroad again at the forty-two-mile post. Between Camak and Thomson, ten miles below, trees in many places were lying in different positions, showing that two storms must have ravaged that section, moving in opposite directions.

In this neighborhood the places of Mrs. Jesse Walton and Ellis Walton suffered great injury. On that of the former, her residence was unroofed, all of the outhouses were blown down, and an old negro man and a child were killed. On the latter place the outhouses were generally demolished. At Dr. T. B. Phinizy's German place all the outhouses were blown down, and it is said three little negro children were blown away, but two of them were afterward found, though no trace of the third one has been obtained. A letter, apparently blown from Thomson, was found in Edgefield, South Carolina. The tornado crossed the Savannah river about ten miles above Augusta, and passed through Edgefield county, thence to Aiken, and then on to Barnwell county.—Augusta Constitutionalist, March 23.

Seamen's Anniversary.

The first anniversary of the Scandinavian Seamen's Friend Society was the occasion of gathering on Sunday evening, in the First Presbyterian church, Lafayette Square, New Orleans, a very large audience, representing almost all the Protestant denominations in our city. The president of the society, Rev. John Mathews, pastor of the Carondelet Street Methodist church, presided.

The secretary of the society presented a report, from which we extract as follows:

Though Scandinavian in name, it is by no means an exclusively national organization, but cosmopolitan in its benevolence. As its constitution plainly states, it aims in the first place "to provide a commodious and conveniently located Bethel, which, under the control and management of the board of trustees, shall, nevertheless, be free to seamen of all nations who may wish to worship God with us."

Secondly, to secure the services of a missionary speaking the Scandinavian language, who shall have charge of all matters pertaining to the spiritual interests of the members of the society.

Thirdly, to furnish medical attendance to all seamen who shall subscribe to our rules and regulations.

Fourthly, to sustain a regular office, boarding-house and free reading-room. In short, in all suitable ways to promote the temporal and spiritual welfare of Scandinavian and other seamen while in this port.

The preliminary meeting, at which the urgent demand for the immediate organization of such a society was first presented and acted upon, convened in the rooms of the New Orleans Seamen's Friend Society, in the Marigny buildings, on the evening of February 2, 1874.

A number of our fellow-citizens, representing all the Protestant denominations in our city, cheerfully took upon themselves the conduct of the proposed enterprise, feeling confident that since the Scandinavian peoples, comprising Danes, Swedes and Norwegians, represent about three-fourths of the mercantile marine trading with this port, there was certainly a large and inviting field for missionary labor. A public meeting was held at the Congregational church, on the evening of March 30, 1874 (just one year ago,) when the objects of this new organization were presented, a very considerable enthusiasm excited in its favor, and some $500 in money pledged for its support. Having thus far but a name, we next sought a local habitation, whence to reach out after the sailors. Meantime we secured the services of a faithful brother, who, feeling called of the Master to this work, left his occupation as a mechanic, and upon the faith of what was yet to come consecrated himself to this cause.

The board of managers at the outset determined to incur no debt in the prosecution of their work, and at the beginning of the present winter were operating only through the personal efforts of their chieftain on shipboard, and wherever he might reach the seamen in their places of resort on shore. Just at this point there was presented by several of the shipmasters most deeply interested in this work, and who had proven their interest by their contributions and zealous advocacy of the cause, an urgent request that we would at once purchase the building, No. 13 Esplanade street. It was found that the property indicated could be had at the very low figure of $4 750, to be divided into three payments. We had not in hand, however, the whole sum needed for the first payment, but such was the urgency of the representative men of the class for whose welfare our society had been chartered that we consented to accept the loan of a sufficient sum to secure to us the transfer of the desired property, and upon New Year's day public religious services were held for the first time in the Bethel of the Scandinavian Seamen's Friend Society. At present we have a preaching service on the morning of each Lord's day and a prayer meeting on every Friday evening, conducted in the Scandinavian language; and on the afternoon of every Sabbath and upon every Sunday evening we have services in English.

We have a very convenient and attractive reading-room, to the supply of which a copy of every daily and weekly paper of the city, both secular and religious, was cheerfully contributed by their respective proprietors. Others among our liberal-hearted fellow-citizens have donated various articles of furniture, and one of our warmest friends among the ship captains gave us a melodeon; so that after but three months' occupation of our new quarters we can confidently assert that for many years, at least, no such an attractive place of resort for this large class of our floating population—"those that go down to the sea to do business in great waters"—has had a place among the benevolent organizations of our city. The query very naturally arises: Why this new society, where so many kindred enterprises are already claiming the support of the public, and especially when through its auxiliary, the New Orleans Seamen's Friend Society, the American Seamen's Friend Society has been for many years operating in the same field? To this we reply that this latest organization is not the spontaneous outcome of the Christian philanthropy of New Orleans, but has sprung into life at the urgent call of a large majority of those ship captains visiting this port that take an active interest in the welfare of their crews. That they so persistently pressed their claims upon our sympathy and aid is clearly indicative of the fact that the society already in the field was inadequate, either by reason of the scope or method of its operations, to meet their wants, and it was only with an association of this kind that, in such times as we have been and are now passing through, we consented to add another to the causes demanding the generous support of every follower of the Lord Jesus Christ in this city. During the year about $2,500 have been contributed in aid of this society, of which sum almost $1,500 has been given by the captains and crews of Scandinavian vessels. Such, in brief, is the history of the first year of the Scandinavian Seamen's Friend Society of New Orleans.

Missionary Festival

AT DRYADES ST. GERMAN CHURCH.

Surely the urgent appeals for help from our missionary secretaries are not chronic fault-finding reiterations. But how can we help the cause of foreign missions? The property of our Germans consists principally in real estate; and, alas, most of their houses are for rent; and for those occupied the tenants withhold payment. What, then, can I do for foreign missions? I concluded to hold a missionary festival; had tickets printed, at twenty-five cents each. People will go anywhere, even to church, if they have to pay for it. The Sunday school scholars and teachers prepared suitable songs and addresses. Having offered prizes of hymn and tune-books to children selling more than ten tickets, the tickets sold very readily.

The festival proved a perfect success. The house was crowded, the singing excellent, the speaking fine. A basket collection was, of course, also taken. And now, after having paid for printing the tickets, and for the prizes offered for selling them, I hold in my hand $125 for foreign missions. Jews and Gentiles have bought our tickets, and to convert Jews and Gentiles this money will be expended.

I would suggest that our preachers do not look upon their Sunday schools as fancy flower gardens, but rather use them as capital which it is their duty profitably to invest for the furtherance of Christ's kingdom.

Very respectfully, Mr. Editor, your humble brother,

J. B. A. AHRENS.

IN a Dublin theater, a few nights since, the clown attempted to make fun by using the names of Messrs. Moody and Sankey. But the audience hissed the fellow off, and then in full chorus sang one of the popular revival hymns till the curtain fell.

Books and Periodicals.

REASONABLE ELOCUTION. A text-book for schools, colleges, clergymen, lawyers, actors, etc. By F. Tavenner Graham. A. S. Barnes & Co., New York and Chicago, 1875.

So far as a brief examination enables us to judge, this is a very reasonable exhibition of the art of speaking. The method and general system of teaching elocution of the author strike us as very wise and effective. 12mo, 211 pages. Price, sent by mail postpaid, $1 25.

FROM the same publishers, A. S. Barnes & Co., we have received Easy Lessons in Language, by S. W. Clark, A. M., and Peck's First Lessons in Numbers, both very good works for beginners. Price of Easy Lessons, thirty-five cents; of First Lessons, twenty-five cents.

SCRIBNER'S MONTHLY ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE for April is a number of more than usual interest. The illustrations are numerous and excellent, and the articles are fresh and varied. We give the titles of some: The Proud Lady of Shavoren, A Chat About German Parliaments, Death-Dealing Trades, The Liverpool of America, A Farmer's Vacation, The Statue of a Life. The interesting story of Seven Oaks, by Dr. Holland, is continued, this number containing chapters 9 and 10.

LIPPINCOTT'S MAGAZINE, APRIL. The contents are as follows: Australian Scenes and Adventures, illustrated; The Golden Eagle and His Eyrie; Three Feathers; Sonnet; Nice; The Raskol and Sects in Russia; Eleanor's Career; An American Lady's Occupations Seventy Years Ago; A March Violet; What is a Conclave? Monsoor Pacha; How Ham Was Cured; On the Study of Shakespeare's Sonnets; Our Monthly Gossip; Literature of the Day.

ST. NICHOLAS for April is splendidly illustrated, and has a wonderfully fine display of articles adapted to amuse and instruct the young people. Here are some of the titles: Cinderella, That Bunker Hill Powder, The Great Freshet, The Fair at Pan, The Pilot-Boat, The Peterkins Snowed Up.

FROM Rev. Charles B. Galloway, of Jackson, Mississippi, we have received a copy of the Minutes of the Mississippi Conference. They are published by Revs. Jno. A. Ellis and Charles B. Galloway in behalf of the East Mississippi College. Price, twenty-five cents per copy.

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE of March 20 has: The English Bar and the Inns of Court, Fated to be Free, Religious Revivals in Medieval Italy, Alice Lorraine, Early Kings of Norway, Vagabonds in Winter-Time, The Tyranny of Mothers.

SHELDON & Co. will publish in a few days a new volume by C. H. Spurgeon, called "Types and Emblems." Mr. Spurgeon is now probably the foremost of living preachers, and all his writings are welcomed by religious readers.

MORTON'S MONTHLY HOME AND SCHOOL, one of the best periodicals of the day, is published at Louisville, Kentucky, at $1.50 per annum. We have received the March number.

The Lay Evangelists.

The following facts, says the Christian Observer, gathered from last week's exchanges, will be read with interest:

Messrs. Whittle and Bliss were expected to commence a series of services in Cincinnati yesterday, Tuesday, March 23. They go there at the invitation and have the cordial approval of evangelical ministers.

They are expected to begin a series of meetings in Nashville on April 15. At a meeting held lately, attended by Baptist, Cumberland Presbyterian, Presbyterian and Methodist ministers, a communication was read from them, fixing that date as the earliest that they could come to Nashville. After full discussion it was resolved to invite them to Nashville at that time, and Rev. Drs. Jones, Baird, Hargrove and T. A. Hoyt were appointed a committee of arrangements. The Nashville Christian Advocate says:

"Their measures may not be to our mind, but if they can bring the gospel to bear upon the masses that we never reach, we at least have no cause to complain."

The Courier-Journal counts up the additions to the churches in Louisville as follows: "The Presbyterians have received 142 accessions; the Methodists, 105; Broadway Baptist church, 12; Chestnut Street Baptist, several." The count is evidently not full or complete.

In Chicago, the Interior says, "the additions to churches of all denominations in the city and suburban towns, the first Sabbath in this month, were unusually large. In the city the largest accessions were made to churches on the West Side, where Messrs. Whittle, Bliss and Morehouse have conducted meetings."

IN THE PIPES.

BY KATE PUTNAM OSGOOD.

Wearily, noiler the heavy skies,
The elves played on with a lazy croon;
But home and hope an I loving eyes,
And youth and summer and paradise,
Lived over again in that dear old time.

Across the bridge, with its rotting piers,
And the slimy sh river black below,
Stole up a strain to my ears across
Like an echo out of the joyish years—
A breath from the shuttering Long-ago.

The quaint old house s fell away,
And the narrow street was a Bowery lane:
A light came into the waning day,
The ledger and it rain-drawn hay,
And the man who listened was young again.

And back once more in a larger land,
Brighter of blossom and bluer of sky,
Through the clover and over the sand,
And down by the sunny water strand,
We wandered together, she and I.

And out of an idling pleasure boat,
With the idling current dropping down,
Now faint, now full, a changeful note
We heard in the silence fall and float,
And drift away to the distant town.

And the world was all a sunny strand,
And the year was just a day of June,
And Lifeand Love through Fairyland
Walked on together, hand in hand,
While Time went round to that same sweet tune.

How many faiths have turned to sneers!
How many pleasures needed and gone!
But under the wreck of hopes and fears
That golden Past, undimmed by years,
Like a buried jewel yet lives on.

Go, organ-boy, with your wheezy play,
And vex the souls of the busy throng.
You have given again to one man's way
The simple perfect Eden day
He ever has known in his whole life long.

Oh! organ-boy, if you and I,
And the pipes that play with a lazy croon,
Could catch old Time's le surries by,
And bid him, under that sunnier sky,
Forever go round to that same sweet tune!

From Our Little Friends.

FROM A LITTLE READER.

FRANKLIN, LA., March 8, 1875.

DEAR MR. EDITOR: Your welcome paper is such a treat to me, especially the Child's Corner, that I must thank you for it. I am only eight years old, but I can and do appreciate very highly your pleasing stories and instruction to the little children. I cannot write yet; I get mamma to write, and I tell her just what I want to say. We have no Sabbath school out here to attend, but mamma teaches my little sisters and myself, and we have a very pleasant Sabbath school at home every Sabbath. I would like so much to see you, Mr. Editor. I know you are dear and pleasant, just like your paper. I want you to give my love to all the preachers. I love them all very dearly. They talk so sweetly about the Savior. God bless them all this year.

I think so much about Bro. Daves, the superintendent of the Mexican mission, so far away. I wish to see him again. I never forget to ask God to take care of him and bless him, and I know my prayers are heard, though I am a little child. I will soon learn to write to you myself. I will close. Good-by.

Your little friend,

LILIAN MAY WILLIAMS.

HAVANA, ALA., March 6, 1875.

DEAR MR. EDITOR: I am not acquainted with you, but pa says you are a fine-looking and good man. I think this must be so, because you publish so many good things for the little folks in the Child's Corner. I like it, and read it with great interest.

My name is Henry Gabriel Hawkins, and I am a little boy nine years old; my birthday was on the fifth of October. I have a mother, papa, three brothers—George, who is older than I, Coke and Brother Ira—and two little sisters, the youngest. All of us that are old enough go to Sunday school. Our Sunday school has been rather small through the winter, but I hope it will improve as spring advances. Our superintendent is Mr. B. Travis. He is a good and kind man; very generous to the church and preachers. My teacher is Mrs. Travis. She is always at her post. I am studying Dr. Summers' Scripture Catechism, volume 1, and the Wesleyan Catechism, volume 2. I also go to an every-day private school, supported by Captain James Jack, one of our oldest Methodists at this place. He takes three of pa's children and a number of others into his school. We have a capital teacher—Miss Vic. Riddle. I am studying algebra, history, geography, grammar and arithmetic.

George, my oldest brother, goes to H. Tutwiler, at Greene Springs, one of the best schools in the South. We will not go to school to-day, because Captain Wright, of California, and General Johnson, of Tuskaloosa, will address the people here on the subject of the grange.

Pa is in his fourth year on this circuit. We like to live here. The people are kind to us, and we shall be sorry when we have to leave them at the close of this year. I could write more, but my letter is already too long. So I remain

Your affectionate little friend,

H. G. HAWKINS.

"HE THAT believeth not shall be damned."—Mark xvi, 16.

That man and his mighty race are now in a state of probation or trial is very evident from the teaching of the gospel; and it is equally plain, from that teaching, that when this probation ends—as it does at the hour of death—man and his race will never more be placed in a state of probation. Therefore it is reasonable to conclude that man's course of conduct in his present state will forever fix his destiny, either for weal or for woe! Hence, when our Lord Jesus Christ, in the final judgment, shall pronounce the awful sentence, "Depart, ye cursed," and they shall "go away into everlasting punishment," the unbelieving shall leave the gospel behind them. Nevermore shall they behold its blessed light; nevermore shall they hear its joyful invitations; nevermore shall they feel its awakening and saving power!

Full of sin, and burdened by ever-accumulating guilt, they must forever follow their downward bent to commit the most enormous wickedness, until their crimes, both in numbers and magnitude, shall far surpass the strongest imagination of earth, and fill even the inhabitants of hell with amazement and horror.

There is a vast difference between the law of God and his gospel. The law is eternal and universal—as much so as God is himself. It exists and is fixed in God's eternal rectitude, and therefore it has always existed and will ever exist in all places, even in hell, absolutely requiring moral rectitude on the part of all intelligences.

The gospel, however, is different. It is an emanation from the love of God, which was specially prepared and sent forth to accomplish the salvation of man from sin upon the earth, and to furnish bliss for the saints in heaven. Therefore the gospel pertains to earth and to heaven. There will be no gospel in hell! The gospel blesses and saves, and there will be no such blessed work for it to perform in hell!

Ah! we sometimes wonder and inquire: "What is hell? What is damnation?" Is it not enough for us to know: It is to be without the gospel forever!

No wonder hell is "the blackness of darkness!" W. S. T.

Ministering Angels.

We see them not in their luminous flight
Down the empyrean, to gild with light
The slumber hours that oft obscure life's hours,
Till charmed with these winged messengers' powers.

The soothing, peaceful calm we often realize, and which brightens our existence, like the sunbeam that changes the crystal dew of early morn to gems of sparkling light, is the influence of ministering angels—the holy messengers of God—daily ministering to us some fresh fount of love, some entrancing strain of heaven-born melody, breathed from heavenly lyres, turning us from the alluring charms of earth to joys eternal, which pass not away. Unseen by mortal eyes, yet by their entertaining presence we are often lost in delight and divine beauty. Oh, thought full of rapture, that we, sinful, erring mortals, are attended by such care, such holy presence! Then let us strive to be ministering angels of earth, in words, acts and all the walks of life, whispering words of love and cheer to some crushed heart, pouring balm upon its bleeding wounds. Oh, the good we might accomplish we know not, if the right cord is touched and made to thrill in sympathetic harmony with those around! Many human flowers, rare and lovely, could we cultivate, training them for a beauteous bloom among flowers immortal, their perfumed signet set on hopes of heaven, casting from their hearts' depths glittering pearls of light, shining like the misty sheen upon the lily's breast, touched by the golden glance of the sunbeam. Yes, many bright stars would pass from beneath the gloomy cloud that so obscures them from sight, and shine with luster in the brightest constellation, were they only nursed with ministerings of love and kindness, to win them from the gross paths of common life. Let us strive more, if possible, to be ministering angels to all our fellow-beings, as we are ministered to from the shining bands of angelic hosts. What a reward will we attain among the blessed if we faithfully follow the pleasant paths of duty to God and man. Our lives will be inwrought with golden blessings tinted with perfect beauty, our inheritance among the redeemed, where our sinless souls will join the heavenly choir, and we will emulate the songs of the angels. Glorious hope! On faith's bright wings we soar away, and enter eternal joy and peace forever.

RUTH.

BURNT PRAIRIE, March 11, 1875.

MR. EDITOR: We have organized a Sabbath school about six miles from Warrington, Florida. We have been blessed with fine success so far. At present we have fifteen scholars, and fine prospects of more. We have a good and kind superintendent, who takes a great deal of pains with the children. His name is Mr. J. W. Williams. We have preaching here on Friday before the second Sabbath in each month. Our circuit preacher, this year, is the Rev. W. Hargrave Morris. He is a very kind and good man. We are all well pleased with him. Last Friday he preached a sermon from the text: "Cast all your cares on him, for he careth for you." Never shall I forget the stress that he placed upon these words. We pray that we may have success with our little Sabbath school and church, and that they may be the means of bringing many souls to Christ. Hoping that you will be so kind as to allow this a small space in the ADVOCATE, I remain, dear editor,

Yours respectfully,

THEODORE E. KELLY.

The Collier's Last Meeting.

One evening, at a religious meeting held by the American evangelists, Messrs. Moody and Sankey, in Edinburg, a grim, tough-looking miner might have been seen among the listeners on one of the forward seats. He was one of those who know not only what it is to love sin, but what it is to have enough of it, and grow tired of it. His conscience was not dead, but no influence near him had ever seemed strong enough to ripen into confession his secret longings for a better heart.

Now his interest was excited by the fame of these foreign preachers and their work in Scotland, and he came, partly in curiosity and partly in serious earnest, to hear them.

And a model hearer he was that evening, whether in knew it or not. Prayers, hymns, preaching, the rough man drank in eagerly. The service began to have a strange charm for him. It was not so much that it was new as that it took hold of him in a new way.

Before long his heart told him that he was listening to God's pleadings, and not to the two evangelists who led the meeting. The short sermon came home to him like the cry of his own soul. Those sweet hymns touched him like music from the heavenly city, and before he was aware his eyes were wet. One after another the simple melodies broke upon his ear and melted him to penitence.

The general exercises over, he started as from a spell. His companion, a rugged fellow-miner, who had been less affected than himself, rose to go, and he rose with him. They walked a little way down the aisle, but the penitent man could go no farther. He turned back and sat down.

"Come, John," said his comrade; "come awa' home."

"Na," said John, "I came here to get good an' I hinna ta'en it a' in yet."

Before he left the house that night he was led to consecrate himself, a penitent man, unreservedly to Christ. The "old, old story" had not been told him in vain.

"I hae thoct often an' often it mann be true," he said, "an' noo I believe it. It bides in me, an' makes peace. I'm sure o' my Savior at last." And so he went home.

Next day, while he was at work far down in the deep coal-pit, a mass of stone or "horseback" fell on him from the roof of the mine, and crushed him so badly that he could not live. The other colliers rushed to him and tried to aid him, but he knew he was dying. "Bend doon your ear to me," he whispered to one of them who stood over him. The man stooped and caught his last words: "O Andrew, I am thankful I settled it last night."

Obituaries.

DIED, on Friday, March 19, at Belair plantation, parish of Plaquemines, Mrs. O. KAY, aged sixty-seven years.

ELVIRA PORTER, wife of William L. Porter, and daughter of Daniel and Matilda McLeod, departed this life December 16, 1874, aged twenty-two years, one month and nine days.

Elvira is dead, but we have the blessed assurance that she has entered "the rest that remains for the people of God." She seemed to be perfectly sensible of her approaching dissolution several days before her departure. She often spoke of death, but not as one that has no hope. She spoke of it as all true Christians do—without fear. From her own words it is evident that she fully realized what the psalmist said in the twenty-third psalm: "Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil." She was of a most amiable disposition, kind and affectionate to all. She so deported herself at home and abroad as to gain the confidence of all who knew her. She joined the church when quite young, and from the time she connected herself with it she continued to evidence her desire of salvation until the day of her death. She did not act like a great many professed Christians do, as if she had lost sight of the fact that she was a member of the church, but her acts proved that she was really religious.

Just before she died, knowing that her mother, brothers and sisters were much grieved at the thought of seeing her die, she quietly asked them not to weep for her. She assured them that she was exceedingly happy in the anticipation of being so kindly released from this troublesome world. She knew that it was far better to depart and be with Christ, whom she so much loved. She talked to all those who drew near her bed in reference to the importance of living right, of being truly the servants of God. She asked them not to forget that sin is dangerous, and that it is calculated to deprive them of all true happiness, both in this world and in that which is to come. God grant that her husband and all her brothers and sisters may treasure these admonitions in their hearts, redeem them to practice, and ever lead a peaceful and godly life; so that when they have ended their career in this life they may meet her on Canaan's peaceful shore. L. C. CALHOUN.

EDNA TORBERT, only daughter of J. T. and Rebecca Torbert, died at the residence of her parents, Spring Hill, Marengo county, Alabama, February 12, 1875, aged fifteen years.

Dear Edna, we cannot think her dead! She was a girl we could but love; so true in all the relations of life; a very child in years, yet a woman in every duty that devolved upon her. As a daughter, she was ever forgetful of self, and only mindful of screening her beloved parents from every burden and care, as far as it was in her power to do so. As a sister, never so happy as when contributing, by many little acts of thoughtful kindness, to the comfort and welfare of her brothers. As a friend, kind and loving in her nature, always ready, with a cheerful smile and willing hand, to aid and comfort all around her.

She cared little for making a display in society, as is common with girls of her age. Her heart was at home. There she had few equals and no superior. She was the light of the family circle—the one whose bright and cheerful face cast light and sunshine over that now lonely household. It would almost appear that it can hardly be home without Edna.

But the best of all is, she was a Christian. Last summer, during a protracted meeting held at this place by our beloved pastor, Bro. Thames, she, with many others of her young companions, professed faith in Christ, and with them gave her pure young heart to God and her hand to the church. From that time until her death her walk was what we might have expected from one brought up and nurtured in the church and Sunday school, as she had been from her infancy.

The writer of this visited her in her last illness and tried to converse with her; but so great was her suffering that it was quite impossible for her to compose her mind for a moment. But from the little conversation we had I learned that she was still putting her trust in God; said she had no fear, but was resigned to his will, living or dying. In bidding her farewell for awhile we sorrow not as those without hope, but look forward with the blessed assurance that we shall meet her again in that beautiful home which God has prepared for the redeemed in Christ, where we shall hunger no more, nor thirst any more, and all tears shall be wiped away, and where we with her will make part of that bright company that shall gather around the throne of God.

ELLEN ABERNETHY.

GEORGE DOUGHERTY MCCORMICK was born in Colleton district, South Carolina, November 4, 1811, and died of pneumonia, at his residence in Jasper county, Mississippi, February 18, 1875, aged sixty-three years, three months and fourteen days. His father, Rev. John McCormick, removed from South Carolina to Mississippi in 1822, and settled in what is now known as Jones county. From thence he removed to Jasper county, Mississippi, in 1833. Our brother was married to Miss Sallie Millsaps, daughter of Hon. Uriah Millsaps, December 5, 1833. From that marriage he leaves eight surviving children—four sons and four daughters—all of whom are married and settled in life. He was married again, to Mrs. Celia Mounger, relict of the late Hon. Henry Mounger, and the mother of Rev. Edwin Mounger, of the Mississippi Conference. He leaves one son and one daughter by his last marriage, the younger of whom is nearly eighteen years old. In a letter received from his son he says: "Father was sick about ten days and suffered a great deal, but his sickness and sufferings were borne with patience and fortitude such as become a dying Christian. His pastor, Rev. Mr. Holland, visited him a day or two before he died, and asked him about the evidences of his acceptance with God. He remarked that he had never such bright evidences as some seemed to have, but told him he felt perfectly resigned to the will of his heavenly Father, and had no fears of death.

"Father did not call his family around him, as some do, and exhort them and advise them; but in this respect he was, when dying, as he had been while living—in his lifetime he showed his children how to live, and in his death he showed them how to die. He walked calmly and fearlessly down into the cold waters of the dark river and passed over to the other shore."

I became acquainted with Bro. G. D. McCormick in 1839 or 1840—shortly after I joined the church. He was a member of the church also, and we soon became friends. From that time to the day of his death he was my fast friend. No man occupied a higher place in my esteem than he did for more than thirty years; and, now that he is dead, no man more sincerely mourns his death. Ever since I accepted license to preach—which I did very tremblingly in the year 1841—he has encouraged by his conversation, and propped and strengthened my feeble energies by his counsels. And always, when I would be riding the circuit on which he lived, when I was in need (if he knew it) he assisted me with his money. Not myself alone, but many others of his brethren in the ministry have shared in the benefits of his liberality. I can testify that for more than thirty years he has been the poor traveling preacher's friend. His house has been a home for him and his purse has supplied his needs. He dearly loved the Methodist Church and all her cherished institutions; consequently he was always ready and willing to do all he could to promote her interests.

In him were united all the important elements that enter into the formation of the character of a Christian gentleman. He embraced religion soon after his first marriage, and his piety was of the genuine stamp. It was not wont to display itself in ebullitions of rapture, but was calm, deep, wise and practical. He had a mind well cultivated, well balanced, and well stored with the best lore of the best books in the world. His manners were quiet and soft and gentle as a lady's. He rarely if ever spoke disparagingly of any one. His rule was, if he could not speak well of a man, not to speak of him at all. Nor would he hear another patiently if he spoke in reproachful terms of his fellow-men. He was brave as Bonaparte in the maintenance of whatever he believed to be right, never compromising an iota where principle was involved. He was as true as steel in his friendships, firm in his principles, kind and considerate in his feelings, genial and forgiving in his nature, never cherishing malice toward any one. He felt a wrong done to himself or his friend, as keenly, repelled it as promptly and forgave it as readily as any man I ever knew. Before and up to the close of the late unhappy war he was a man of considerable property, and I believe he was conscientious in the use and disbursement of the proceeds of this God-bestowed blessing committed to his keeping. After defraying the current expenses of his large family and the schooling of his children he appropriated the greater portion of his annual income to charitable uses. He gave liberally to the support of the church, to the aid of the poor and to the promotion of benevolent institutions. Since the war his means have been much more limited. Nevertheless, he has ever been the hospitable gentleman at home, and, in proportion to his means, as liberal a supporter of the church and all charitable institutions as he was before. In short, to do good and not evil was the great leading purpose of his life. The whole bent of his character, and every important act of his life, was made to bear directly upon this one great purpose; and hence all tended to elevate, to purify, to bless him.

In all respects he was a model of consistent Christian piety, and, so far as I could see, he was a man without a fault. I knew my deceased friend when he was a young man in the bloom of his manhood; I both loved and admired him then. I have known him intimately for thirty-five years, during which time I have marked the growth and development of his character, and have witnessed the results of the most trying conditions and circumstances he has had to encounter during the long period of our acquaintance, and amid them all he has steadfastly remained the same pious, zealous, uniform, upright man.

Later in life I have known him as the venerable head of a large and intelligent family. He had spent a moderately long life of useful diligence, and felt that his life-work was well-nigh done. Viewing him in this most sacred and honored relation, I thought I loved and admired him more than ever. In the management of his temporal affairs he was still diligent in business, firm in discipline, harmoniously regulating all his domestic concerns. In his spiritual affairs he seemed to have a mind calmly reposing on God, a steady, humble, firm acquiescence in the divine will, an entire freedom from discontent and repining, and a full persuasion that a heavenly rest awaited him. In his tranquil state of mind he spent the evening of his life, and in it he died, leaving the fragrance of his example to his children.

The Christian Advocate.

THURSDAY, APRIL 1, 1875.

THE following poem was written to his son by Timothy Swan, author of the bones "China" and "Poland," when in his seventy-third year.

Ye ken, dear bairn, that we mann part
When death could death, shall bid us start;
But when he'll send his Gar'd' dart
We canno soy;
So we'll be ready for his dart
Maist onie day.

We'll keep a' right and guile wi'd;
Our wark will then be free frae sin;
Upright we'll sten thro' lifek and linb
Straight on our way;
Deal just wi' a', the prize we'll win
Maist onie day.

Ye ken there's Ane, wha's best and wise,
Has said that a' his bairns should rise
An' soar aboon the lofty skies,
And there shall stay,
Being well prepared, we'll gain the prize
Maist onie day.

Wheo he wha made a' things just right
Shall call us hence to realms of light,
Be it morn or noon, or e'en or night,
We will obey;
We'll be prepared to tak' our flight
Maist onie day.

Our lamps we'll all brimfu' o' oil
That's guide and pure—that wudna spoil;
We'll keep them burning a' the while
To light our way.
Our wark behin' done, we'll quit the soil
Maist onie day.

The American Revivalists in England.

The success of Messrs. Moody and Sankey in London is assured. We judge that we are speaking within bounds when we say that no such pervading religious interest has been known in England since the days of Whitefield and the Wesleys. On last Sunday it is estimated that seventeen thousand women were present at the afternoon meeting at Agricultural Hall, Islington, and twenty thousand men in the evening. The cable dispatches have begun to announce something more than that cases of insanity have been developed by the excitement, and we presume that by this time the staid Times and the dignified Saturday Review have been compelled against their will to take notice of the movement.

The only satisfactory explanation of the success of these evangelists is that the Spirit of God is in their work. To those who know Mr. Moody no word is necessary in praise of his straightforward simplicity and his unobtrusiveness. He is a plain, honest, believing Christian, with a quaint frankness of utterance, who has no doubt of his message, and can tell with a very simple, unconscious eloquence the story of the love of Christ. The Rev. R. W. Dale, one of the leading clergymen in England, who has watched with critical sympathy the progress of this work, gives some phases of its character, which may indicate its nature more clearly to our readers.

The preliminary prayer meetings and the accounts published of the success in other places had done much to prepare the way for the evangelists when they came. This gave them an excellent advertisement. Besides this, in every city there were hundreds of people whose friends, schoolmates and shop-fellows had written to them, urging them to be prepared for the blessing. After the first day or two scores went home with overflowing joy to tell their friends that Jesus of Nazareth was passing by. Says Mr. Dale:

"I had seen occasional instances before of instant transition from religious anxiety to the clear and triumphant consciousness of restoration to God: but what struck me in the gallery of Bingley Hall was the fact that this instant transition took place with nearly every person with whom I talked. They had come up into the gallery anxious, restless, feeling after God in the darkness, and when, after a conversation of a quarter of an hour or twenty minutes, they went away, their faces were filled with light, and they left me not only at peace with God, but filled with joy. I have seen the sunrise from the top of Helvellyn and the top of the Righi, and there is something very glorious in it; but to see the light of Heaven suddenly strike on man after man in the course of one evening is very much more thrilling. These people carried their new joy with them to their homes and their workshops. It could not be hid."

Above all, the services were attractive. In Brimingham ten or twelve thousand were in the hall an hour before the regular meeting began, singing the popular melodies. That the hymns and tunes were what the people wanted there can be no doubt, however far short they come of a critic's requirements. The services had no prearranged order, and the meeting occupied but an hour and a quarter, followed by the "after meeting." Then Mr. Moody's eloquence is so transparent that it is not recognized as eloquence; but it tells. Everybody is extremely interested; but there is nothing that seems remarkable about it or competent to produce the effect. He talks in the most easy, unconventional, straightforward way, as if he was conversing with half a dozen friends at his fireside. You would no more think of criticising him than you would of criticising a friend with whom you exchange a word on the street. He is familiar, very familiar with sacred things, but not irreverent. Then he presents to his hearers an immediate duty. He insists incessantly on the possibility of instantaneous conversion, and he meets a response from his hearers.

Perhaps the most important agency in the system of these revivalists is the "after meeting." All inquirers are invited to remain, and Christians who can instruct and direct them are admitted by ticket. It is the quiet, unexciting conversation of these after meetings that reaps the harvest. "I went up into the gallery," said one young man, "and Mr. Sankey walked up and down with me and talked to me as though he had been my own father; and I found Christ." Mr. Moody's quaint directions are: "Let the young men talk to the young men, the maidens to the maidens, the elder women to the elder women, and the elder men to the elder men." Cultivated young ladies, says Mr. Dale, were sitting or standing with girls of their own age, sometimes with two or three together, whose eager faces indicated the earnestness of their desire to understand how they were to lay hold of the great blessing. Young men were talking to lads—some of their own social position, others with black hands and rough clothes, which were suggestive of gun-making and rolling mills and brass foundries. Ladies of refinement were trying to make the truth clear to women whose worn faces and poor dress told of the hardships of their daily life. Men of business, local politicians, were at the same work with men of forty and fifty years of age.

We presume that the aristocracy and the literati of England will source hear of the movement that is about them. It is an after generation that builds the monuments of the prophets. Bunyan got no words of honor from the Duke of Bedford, whose descendant has lately set up his statue. The Wesleyan Reformation was scoffed at by the fathers of those who laud it in history. Even the Founder of our religion was not rated very highly by his cultivated cotemporaries. But it is such earnest Christian work as these two Americans and their British associates are doing, however sneered at now, that will best resist the torrent of atheism and immorality, and save Great Britain through her lower classes to Christ and his church.

The Civil Rights Bill.

That all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall be entitled to the full and equal enjoyment of the accommodation, advantages, facilities and privileges of inns, public conveyances (on land or water,) theaters and other places of public amusement, subject only to the conditions and limitations established by law, and applicable alike to citizens of every race or color, regardless of any previous condition of servitude. That any person who shall violate the foregoing section, by denying to any citizen, except for reasons by law applicable to citizens of every race and color, and regardless of any previous condition of servitude, the full enjoyment of any of the accommodations, advantages, facilities and privileges in said section enumerated, or by aiding or inciting such denial, shall, for every such offense, forfeit and pay the sum of $500 to the person aggrieved thereby, to be recovered in an action of debt with the full costs, and shall also, for every such offense, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $1,000, or shall be imprisoned not less than thirty days nor more than one year, provided that all persons may elect to sue for the penalty aforesaid, or to proceed under their rights at common law and by State statutes; and, having so elected to proceed in the one mode or the other, right to proceed in the other jurisdiction shall be barred; but this provision shall not apply to criminal proceedings, either under this act or the criminal law of any State; and provided further, that a judgment for the penalty, in favor of the party aggrieved, or a judgment upon an indictment, shall be a bar to either prosecution respectively.

SEC. 3. That the District and Circuit Courts of the United States shall have, exclusively of the courts of the several States, cognizance of all crimes and offenses against any violations of the provisions of this act, and actions for the penalty given by the preceding section may be prosecuted in the Territorial, District or Circuit Courts of the United States wherever the defendant may be found, without regard to the other party, and the district attorneys, marshals and deputy marshals of the United States, and commissioners appointed by the Circuit and Territorial Courts of the United States, with powers of arresting and imprisoning or bailing offenders against the laws of the United States, are hereby specially authorized and required to institute proceedings against every person who shall violate the provisions of this act, and cause him to be arrested and imprisoned or bailed, as the case may be, for trial before such court of the United States or Territorial Court as by law has cognizance of the offense, except in respect of the right of action accruing to the person aggrieved; and such district attorneys shall cause such proceedings to be prosecuted to their termination, as in other cases; provided that nothing contained in this section shall be construed to deny or defeat any right of civil action accruing to any person, whether by this act or otherwise; and any district attorney who shall willfully fail to institute and prosecute the proceedings herein required shall for every such offense forfeit and pay the sum of $500 to the person aggrieved thereby, to be recovered by any action of debt with full costs, and shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be fined not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000; and provided further, that a judgment for the penalty, in favor of the party aggrieved, against any such district attorney, or a judgment upon an indictment against any such district attorney, shall be a bar to either prosecution respectively.

SEC. 4. That no citizen possessing all other qualifications which are or may be prescribed by law shall be disqualified for service as grand or petit juror in any court of the United States, or of any State, on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude; and any officer or other person charged with any duty in the selection or summoning of jurors, who shall exclude or fail to summon any citizen for the cause aforesaid, shall on conviction thereof be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be fined not more than $5,000.

SEC. 5. That all cases arising under the provisions of this act in the courts of the United States shall be reviewable by the Supreme Court of the United States, without regard to the sum in controversy, under the same provisions and regulations as are now provided by law for the review of other causes in said court.

English Tea-Making.

That the English are pre-eminently a tea-drinking nation is an accepted fact. That they should excel in the preparation of their favorite beverage as naturally follows, and a cup of English tea already takes rank with a cup of French coffee, delighting those who taste. But to thoroughly enjoy the charm one must see the English breakfast-table—its silver urn, radiant with careful polish; the dainty service, of pure white China, or Molton or Worcester ware, sprinkled or wreathed with flowers; the low silver teapot of our grandmother's time. The sugar-bowl, milk-jug and slop-bowl to match the cups are prettiest, and, when all of silver, they intensify the whiteness of the damask table-cover, and gleam bright in the morning light, which is too often a dull one from English skies. This is the still life of the breakfast-room. Now comes the touch that vivifies the whole. A light-footed attendant fills the urn with water, and touches a match to the spirit-lamp beneath. The reader of the morning paper comes in and shakes it rustling from its folds. The tea-maker enters—either mother or daughter—and with her morning greetings buries herself among the cups. The little tea-caddy (pretty enough for such grouping) is opened and the regulation "teaspoon for each person and one for the pot" measured out into the empty teapot. Enough of the boiling water is drawn from the urn to cover the fragrant leaves, and at last that peculiar English institution, the "ten-cozy," is called in requisition. Fancy a double-wadded cap of some woolen material, flannel or cloth, either of bright color or made gay with braiding or some ornamentation, a generous oval on one side, straight on the other, drawn over the teapot, completely covering it like an extinguisher, and shutting in the heat while the green leaves unroll, and all the delicate flavor is extracted. Five, ten or fifteen minutes pass. The cups are half filled with hot water, and stand warming through and through, sending little clouds of steam into the air. The urn sings low. A little group gather about the table, and pleasant things are said across it by gentle-voiced and gentle-mannered English girls. The toast appears, and eggs, with perhaps thin, wafer-like slices of well-browned bacon, or the national beef-steak, and the simple breakfast is ready. Now the blessing asked, the tea-cozy is lifted, the teapot is filled with the proper amount of boiling water, the cups emptied into the indispensable slop-bowl, which accompanies every tea service, are filled with the aromatic decoction, sugar and milk are added at pleasure, and English tea is made.

Pursuit of Port.

The New York correspondent of the Advance tells this story, which unfortunately will not be believed by most of those to whom the truth is of the most consequence:

"It is the next thing to an impossibility to find on this island genuine foreign wines, except at practically prohibitory prices. An anecdote told me by an eminent professor in one of our theological seminaries will illustrate the fact. A physician in the city said to one of his patients: 'You need a little port wine.' 'Very likely,' was his answer; 'but where is a man to get it?' 'Well,' said the doctor, 'that is a trouble. But I have a friend down town who deals at wholesale directly with Oporto; and I know I can get from him the genuine article.' So down town he went, and into his friend's great establishment. He saw there, on casks and baskets and bottles, the label, 'port wine,' and, going into the counting-room, told his errand. 'Well, I am sorry,' was the answer; 'but we haven't a drop on hand!' 'No? What do these labels mean, then?' 'O they mean that we have as good port wine as you can find anywhere in the city; but if you are after the real juice we cannot furnish it.' 'I am sorry,' said the physician. 'I wanted only a couple of bottles for Mr. A.' 'Ah!—a couple of bottles. If that is all I can accommodate you. I have a little in my cellar at home that one of my captains brought me straight from Oporto eighteen years ago. I am jealous with it as a specially choice article; but I will send you what you want.' So the next day the two bottles came. The doctor sent one to Mr. A., but, retaining the other, had it immediately analyzed. And soon after a swift messenger carried the word to the patient: 'Don't drink that wine, for it hasn't a drop of grape juice in it!'

"There is pure wine to be had, but not by the young men who will follow the example of our rich and respectable moderate drinkers. They will take what they have the means to purchase. And with that fiery poison, while drinking moderately, they will inflame their blood and deprave their appetite beyond the point of self-recovery. That is the history of thousands."

TRUST.—A young lady teaching her class in Sunday school found her lesson for a certain day embracing the Savior's declaration: "Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that believeth on me hath everlasting life."

A little girl inquired:

"Is that true, is it surely true?"

"Oh, yes," replied the teacher, "it is surely true."

"It must be very nice," said the child, "to have everlasting life, and to know that, whatever comes, you are saved, and saved even now."

"Yes," answered the teacher, "it is a great blessing indeed."

"Then you are saved, are you not?" asked the interesting scholar.

"I hope so!" was the reply.

"Hope so!" exclaimed the child. "Why I thought you told me just now it was sure!"

The conversation is said to have led the young lady to see her folly, and to cast herself with undoubting confidence upon Christ for a present, complete and assured salvation.—Christian at Work.

Live Stock and Population.

Prof. Thorold Rogers, of Oxford University, England, has made up a curious return of the proportion of domesticated live stock to population in the most prominent countries in the world. It shows the following results:

Great Britain has one cow to every twelve persons, a sheep for everybody, and one pig for every six.

France has a like proportion of sheep, a double share comparatively of cows, but only one pig to every six persons.

The Swedes have a cow between three and one-half of them, a sheep between two and three-quarters, and a pig to a baker's dozen.

There are as many sheep as there are Norwegians in Norway, when they are all at home, and two and one-half of them (the Norwegians) are entitled to a cow. They can have only one-eighteenth of a pig each.

Denmark has a cow for three persons, as many sheep as persons, and a pig for four and three-quarters persons.

Prussia, with her usual uniformity, has an equal number of cows and pigs, one to every five inhabitants, besides a sheep apiece all round.

Wurtemburg has a quarter as many cows as people, a sheep to two and three-quarters, and a pig to every seven.

Bavaria rates the same as Wurtemburg as to cows and sheep, and is as much better off for pigs as one-fifth is better than one-seventh.

Saxony has a sheep and a pig for every eight persons, and a cow for every six.

Holland has a cow to every four, a sheep to every four, and a pig to twelve persons.

Belgium, a cow to six, a sheep to nine, and a pig to eight (which is an Hibernicism.)

Austria has a cow for every six persons, and a sheep and a pig for every five persons.

Switzerland runs up to the Swedish standard on cows—one to three and one-half persons—and has a sheep for five, and a pig for every seven and one-half persons.

We Americans close the list with a cow for every four of us, a sheep apiece, one pig to every one and one-half.—Rural New Yorker.

THE Rev. Dr. Angus was recently addressing an audience in London, and "brought the house down" by telling the following characteristic story of American life. He said:

"Three years ago I happened to travel from Chicago to San Francisco, on the other side of that continent, with a very intelligent, warm-hearted Wesleyan, and we were talking about the condition of the country and the progress of the denominations, and he told me that along the two thousand five hundred miles between those two cities the railways own alternate blocks of twenty miles, the government owning the other alternate blocks, and in a way very common in America the railways offered to any religious body a site for a chapel and a school-house and minister's house, provided they would undertake to build them within the next ten years, and my friend said the only two bodies that accepted that challenge were the Methodists and the Baptists—(laughter)—and he added: 'You will see how the thing will work. We shall supply the fire, and you will supply the water, and we shall get up the steam along the whole line.' (Much laughter.) I believe in order, and I believe, on the whole, a little more firmly in freedom, but I believe, besides that, if work is to be done, fire and water are the best things." (Cheers.)

THE GARDENS OF MOROCCO.—The groves of rose-trees and the flower farms of Morocco are said by a recent traveler to exceed in extent and value those of Damascus, or even those of the valley of Mexico. The general climate of the country is very favorable to this kind of culture. Swept alternately by the breezes of the Atlantic and Mediterranean, and tempered by the snows of the Atlas ranges, the degree of heat in Morocco is much lower than in Algeria, while the soil is exceedingly fertile. To the date palm, and to orange and lemon trees, the climate appears to be especially suited, the dates of Tafilat having been famous even from Roman times. The orange plantations are of very great extent in various parts of the country, while olives and almonds are also staples exported in large quantities. Seeing that this fertile land, within five days' steam of London, produces so much vegetable wealth under the most barbarous cultivation, it appears extraordinary that European enterprise does not, in such a climate, seek profitable employment for its over-abundant capital in its application to the development of such vast resources so close at hand, instead of going so far afield as Australia or America.

LOCUSTS AND FLEAS.—The locust can be heard a sixteenth of a mile. An ordinary man will outweigh fifteen thousand of them. Were his voice proportionate to his weight as that of the locust, he could make himself heard over one thousand miles.

A flea weighs less than a grain, and leaps a yard and a half. Were a man of one hundred and fifty pounds weight possessed of equivalent agility, he could spring from the dome of the capitol at Washington to New Orleans in a single leap! Evidently man has much to learn before he can lay claim to the physical championship of the universe.

WITHOUT virtue thou canst not have peace. Like the rainbow, peace rests upon the earth, but its arch is lost in heaven! Heaven bathes it in hues of light—it springs up amid tears and clouds, it is a reflection of the eternal sun, it is an assurance of calm, it is the sign of a great covenant between man and God. Such peace is the smile of the soul, it is an emanation from the distant orbs of immortal light.—Bulwer.

Religious Intelligence.

THE woman temperance crusaders have begun operations in Calcutta, with many evidences of success.

THE demand for the Bible and the New Testament in Russia is greater than can be immediately supplied. An edition of ten thousand copies of the latter has been disposed of within a recent period, and another edition is in press.

AN ODD CASE has arisen in New Hampshire. Two Roman Catholics have been elected to the Legislature. The constitution of the State prohibits their sitting. The question now is whether to reject them, admit them against the constitution, or amend the obnoxious clause. The clause has been disregarded heretofore, and probably will be again. It may, in fact, be regarded as nullified by the prohibition of such tests in the constitution of the United States.

AN afflicted family of New York, having about ten thousand dollars to spend in a memorial to a departed member, put it into the erection of a ten-thousand-dollar church at Ogden, in Utah. This building, which bears the name of the Church of the Good Shepherd, has just been consecrated by Bishop Tuttle. This is the best kind of a monument—better than a cemetery full of expensive tombstones, or a ship-load of stained glass windows.

PERHAPS the most priest-ridden country on the face of the earth is poor Spain, and the secret of it is that its people are among the most ignorant of any in the civilized world. Out of a home population of less than 15,000,000 only 3,000,000 can read, and less than 1,250,000 can read and write. On the necks of this ignorant population are fastened 9 archbishops, 53 bishops, 100,000 ecclesiastics, 14,000 monks and 13,000 nuns. There are now 600 convents for women in Spain, but before the suppression of the monasteries for men there were 1,910 monasteries and convents, containing 20,905 monks and 24,700 nuns.—Christian Intelligencer.

THE meetings of Messrs. Moody and Sankey have begun in London with great success. On Sunday, March 14, the attendance was immense. It is estimated that seventeen thousand women were present at the afternoon meeting, and in the evening twenty thousand men were assembled. The evangelists, by cable to George H. Stuart, ask the prayers of all Christians for the success of their work. Fifty thousand dollars have been subscribed to meet the expenses. The Pall Mall Gazette is troubled about the reports of insanity, and hopes that people having tendencies that way will consult with their medical advisers before venturing to the meetings.

THE French Canadian Missionary Society occupies a field on the north side of the St. Lawrence, above Quebec, and on both sides below that point, extending about 500 miles. Its chief schools are at Pointe-aux-Trembles. At all its schools about 2,000 youths have been given a scriptural education. The society employs 20 missionaries. Since its foundation it has circulated 35,000 copies of the Scriptures, and about 350,000 books, tracts and illustrated papers. The Union des Eglises Evangeliques, a national French Canadian Church, with a constitution like that of the Free Church of France, is connected with this society. It has 11 churches, 40 small stations, 6 pastors, 150 church members and 2,000 adherents.

A VERY interesting and successful mission has been carried on for some years among the Ojibway Indians by the Canada Congregational Missionary Society. The chief of each tribe is anxious that his people should have the advantage of the civilizing influences proceeding from a resident teacher, and no difficulties are thrown in the way of such. The society desires to employ native teachers as much as possible, and hopes to be able before long to establish a training school to prepare these teachers for their work. Three hundred dollars will support a married native evangelist for a year. The principal mission stations are French Bay, on the Sougeen Reserve, Sidney Bay, She-she-gwain-ning, and Spanish River, where Miss Baylis, of Montreal, has spent four summers, doing unassisted, among the Indians and whites of the whole settlement, the work of both teacher and pastor. She has met with great success in her efforts to enlighten the benighted understandings of the people, and the children flock eagerly to her school.

THE JAPAN MISSION.—We take pleasure, says the Christian Intelligencer, in presenting an extract from a letter written by Rev. H. F. Verbeck, D. D., at Yedo, on November 21: "The country is overflowing with rejoicings at the successful termination of the Formosan question. War, with all its horrors, has been happily averted, the Japanese having carried all the main points; the savages of Formosa have been chastised; China pays an indemnity, and the peculiar dangers of the Formosan coasts are removed for the future. By this last Japan has placed all seafaring nations in these parts under obligation. The hopeful prospects of the mission work hold out great inducements to me to re-enter the tactical ranks in the field. But Dr. Brown, I think, has not returned from Osaka, and his presence in meeting is necessary to a final decision in regard to my future course. My week-day engagements now oblige me to concentrate my specially Christian efforts on the Lord's day. At eight o'clock A. M. I have a large Sabbath school class; at three o'clock P. M., at a private house in the city, an interesting Bible class; at six o'clock P. M., at my house, four students in New Testament exegesis. The eight o'clock class consists of members of the native union church; the others are independent. The next thing on the national programme may be the revision of the foreign treaties, which is overdue. Much good is hoped from it." In an allusion to the climate of Yedo, Dr. Verbeck writes: "I consider one of the best proofs of the goodness of this climate the generally good health of children of all ages. The only and very important thing we are wanting here for children is good schools."

AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY.—The fiftieth anniversary of the American Tract Society was celebrated on Sunday evening, February 14, in the Madison Square Presbyterian church, New York, Rev. Dr. John Hall presiding. After devotional exercises an account of the work of the society for the past fifty years was read by the secretary, in which he stated that the society was a grand evangelical publishing and missionary society, with twenty-five thousand life directors. In the fifty years of its organization it had sent out 507,000,000 copies of its publications. The society issued yearly 51,000 copies of its publications, 50,000 tracts and periodicals, and 4,000 volumes of books. It had printed 9,357 distinct publications, in 143 languages and dialects. It conducted six periodicals—two weekly and four monthly. The total cash receipts in 1825 were $10,000, and in 1875 $552,391.30. In 1825 the society issued 8,000,000 pages of tracts, and in 1875 141,000,000. The gifts to the society in 1825 were $7,000, and in 1875 $140,000. The sales of books, tracts, etc., in all had amounted to about $8,500,000, and the total gifts to $4,180,000. The business of the society is self-sustaining, and the gifts are used exclusively for benevolent purposes. The colporteurs, fifty in number, have made over 11,000,000 visits to families. Addresses were made by the Rev. Isaac Riley, the Rev. Dr. Henry Darling, of Albany, and the Rev. Dr. Alexander McLeun, secretary of the American Bible Society. At the close of the exercises the Rev. Dr. Hallock pronounced the benediction.

THE visit of the Syrian Jacobite patriarch to England has been made for the purpose of securing from the government the right of ruling the Syrian Christians in Cochin and Travancore. The Church Missionary Intelligencer vigorously dispels the illusion of High Churchmen in regard to this Antiochian prelate, whose residence is at or near Mardin, in Syria. It shows that the Syrian Christians in India were originally Nestorians, and were governed by Nestorian bishops, consecrated from Persia, until the close of the sixteenth century. Then, upon the death of the Nestorian metran or metropolitan, the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Portuguese Goa usurped control over the St. Thomas or Nestorian Christians in India. They endeavored in vain to procure an ecclesiastic from Persia. One who landed in 1651 perished in the flames at a Romish auto da fé. Balked in their attempts in this direction, they welcomed a certain Mar Gregory, who came in 1655, sent by the Jacobite Patriarch of Antioch to enlarge the wealth and influence of that see by a new domain in India. Since that time the St. Thomas Christians have been under Syrian ecclesiastical rule, and the Nestorian patriarchs have endeavored in vain to regain their ancient footing. How the Patriarch of Antioch would use his authority if fully established in India is shown by the resistance which he has made to the reforming tendencies of the late metran, Mar Athanasius, and by the conduct of his bishop, who, when sent to India some years back, threw a copy of the vernacular Scriptures on the floor of one of the churches and trampled it under foot. The successor of this worthy, sent out from Syria still more recently, brought with him a saint's bone, which is put into drinking water, in order that the decoction may cure disease. The Jacobite Church, of Syria is utterly corrupt and ignorant, and it is to be hoped that the English government will not allow its patriarch to stifle the awakening life in the Cochin and Travancore churches. Independent.

THE Annals of the Propagation of the Faith, says the Independent, gives a characteristic report from a missionary who has recently journeyed through northwestern British America, into Alaska, to found a mission there. Among the Indians around Fort Youcon he found, to his grief, that their Protestantism, under the teachings of Mr. McDonald, of the Church Missionary Society, was too strong to be shaken. Thence he travels westward, still troubled by the evidences of Mr. McDonald's labors. Finally, arrived at Nosikakel, he deems himself outside the Protestant influence and applies his peculiar methods, which he thus describes: "I caused the children up to seven years of age to be collected, and I had the happiness to pour the baptismal water over the foreheads of fourteen of them. Next morning another Indian family arrived. I was able to enlist four new little Christians. In the course of the day I collected a large number of Indians and taught them the choruses which we sung at Nosikakel. Three or four times I gathered them around me and scribbled for them hieroglyphs on a dozen leaves of paper, in which I pointed out to them the sense of the words which we sung. Not being able to explain myself, I was content at intervals to show them the crucifix and make them understand that it was the image of the Son of God, who died for us. It was this image which affected them and excited their sensibility." Ahas! when after these efforts, several times repeated, the Indians endeavor to repay the kindness of the missionary, it is by striking up hymns which they had learned from the Protestant, Mr. McDonald. The missionary journeys on into Alaska, following the river by canoe, and gradually escaping the spell of Protestant instruction. Wherever he lands the children are "regenerated." By the time he has reached Fort St. Michael, on the Pacific, he has registered his one hundred and sixteenth baptism, and concludes his report with the words: "Of the number, how many little angels will have flown up to heaven and will pray to God for the success of the new missions. Had this been the only result we attained, would it not be consoling, would it not be enough to compensate the trouble and fatigues of the voyage?"

CHANGE OF RATES.

In conformity with an agreement between the several papers published in the interest of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, the subscription price of the ADVOCATE, including postage, will hereafter be as follows, viz:

One year	$2 50
Six months	1 50
Three months	80

THE SUBSCRIPTION PRICE of the ADVOCATE is One Dollar a Year, Quarter per year to ministers of the gospel, and the same to the widows of deceased itinerant preachers. Where bills have been sent charging them more than that amount it was owing to the fact that they were not known as such to the book-keeper, and if they will inform us the accounts will be corrected. Should they have already paid we will credit the amount overpaid on subscription, or dispose of it as they may order.

LOOK OUT FOR ACKNOWLEDGMENTS.—Subscribers and other persons writing to us should look in the letter list for the acknowledgment of their letters. The letters which reach us on or before Saturday of each week are acknowledged in the issue of the following Thursday.

RATES.

The New Orleans Christian Advocate will be furnished to subscribers hereafter at the following rates, including postage:

One Year	$2 50
Six Months	1 50
Three Months	80

$1.25 A YEAR

to all Ministers of the Gospel, traveling or local, and widows of deceased traveling preachers.

FREE ONE YEAR

to any person forwarding to us four new yearly subscribers, with TEN DOLLARS.

Weather-Wise.

Within the last few years the progress of science has proved exceedingly helpful to those who talk about the weather. A citizen of New Orleans, on any given morning, may not only know which way the wind blows here at home, but he may also know the temperature and the state of the barometer at almost every point in the world. The telegraph tells us of the storms raging on the other side of the Atlantic, the rumblings and shocks of earthquakes in Mexico and Central America, and of the norther that is sweeping down from the gorges of the Rocky mountains upon the valleys and plains of the South. The crash and roar of tornadoes plowing through Mississippi, Georgia or the Carolinas have not ceased before the sad tidings of death and havoc are already here. The stage of water in the Mississippi and its tributaries, from the remotest sources to the ocean, is known by us at this hour, and the state of the ice, the rainfall, the aspect of the heavens, and the degrees of heat or cold prevailing along the banks for thousands of miles, are accurately recorded for our daily information. The crack of the ice gorges in the Delaware, the Hudson, the Ohio and the upper Mississippi is heard by us down here on the gulf coast as soon almost as by those whose homes are crushed and flooded by the mighty forces of the elements.

Our horizon is no longer bounded by the visual line which once limited our knowledge of what was passing in the weather world. Truly "no pent up Utica contracts our powers." The tides on every shore, the storms on every coast, and the disasters on every perilous cape and headland, are revealed to us almost as quickly as our eyes tell us of the aspects of the morning sky under which we awake. The news of wrecked ships comes to us thousands of miles away, while the sailors are yet clinging to the spars, and nearly as soon as their wail reaches the shores on which the doomed crafts are going to pieces.

The varieties and contrasts which this meteorological kaleidoscope spreads before us are wonderful. Our senses are here soothed by the warmth and brightness of spring, and regaled with the odor of orange blossoms, and the fragrance of roses, and the mingled perfumes of violets, jasmins and heliotropes. At the same hour the snow is falling in Omaha, and driving and whirling and drifting across the Canadas. The brooks and cascades of the Adirondacks are bound in icy fetters, and the snow birds are flitting and chirping amidst the falling snowflakes. Here the streams are open, the mocking birds are building their nests, and making our moonlight nights and dewy mornings vocal with their songs. From sunny Cuba, from Mexico, from other lands, we have daily word pictures of temperate and tropical scenes. Cold and heat, storm and calm, flowers and ice, prosperous voyages and dismal catastrophes, rain and sunshine, valleys devastated by floods, and fields smiling under the hand of culture, are all thrown together upon the news canvas of our morning journals. The winds are blowing every way at the same time, the temperature is everywhere from the bulb up to Fahrenheit's highest figure of endurable heat, the ocean is calm, and it is tossed and lashed, there are bright skies and cloudy, rising and falling rivers, droughts and deluges, sowing and harvesting all in the blow of the eye, and photographed upon the mind as by one instantaneous and vivid electric flash.

The effect, however, is not incongruous and discordant. To the eye it is like a painting with every variety of color and scene, in which the shades and grounds are adjusted with matchless and superhuman skill. To the ear it is the music of a grand orchestra, which portrays some famous historical event, or embodies a marvelous conception of genius in a harmonious combination of sounds. If the ear could gather all the notes as they are heard by him that made the ear, even as our ears drink in the overture and the whole magnificence of an oratorio, what a sublime symphony we should have!

The utility of our weather wisdom must not be overlooked. The "probabilities," published daily for our edification, are much better than the guesses of the old almanacs. We may know at least a day or two beforehand what kind of weather we are likely to have. The storm signals, which the telegraph makes possible, are of inestimable service to maritime interests, and thousands of lives and millions of property are annually saved by their use. We have a medium of intelligence now that vies with the light in swiftness, and in comparison with which the wings of the wind are as a snail's pace. The course and dimensions of the cyclone are advertised long before it can reach a given point, and the voyage may be deferred or everything prepared in view of the approaching gale.

The weather has always been regarded as a boon to mankind in the way of conversation. The dullest and most taciturn, and the most dissonant natures, can here find common ground and something to talk about. Probably Adam and Eve, after the raptures of the honeymoon were somewhat abated, found occasion to dilate upon the sweet and exhilarating atmosphere of paradise, and to spice their colloquies in Eden's bowers with apt reflections upon the luscious mornings and golden sunsets of the new-born world. In heaven the good may not find the theme altogether too commonplace for their use. It is not strange that we should talk so much about the weather. No subject in nature has so much to do with the welfare of men. Health, business, agriculture, commerce, all classes, rich and poor, high and low, are concerned. A north wind kills its thousands in a fever epidemic, an east wind is freighted with malaria and the blues; an untimely frost nips our prospects of fruit and of bread in the bud, and a good rain at the right time saves the farmer from want, pays his debts and makes him comfortable.

God's wisdom and providence are in the weather. He sends the rain and the sunshine. His gentle benedictions whisper in the breeze, and his terrors are in the hurricane and the lightning. The piety of a people and their prayers have much to do with the weather. It is good enough as it is, but if the people were better we should have less of judgment and more of mercy. To be weather-wise religiously is the highest style of weather wisdom.

Lay Preaching.

The most successful evangelical work of the day is being done by laymen. Moody and Sankey in England are stirring the masses as they have not been stirred since the time of the Wesleys and Whitefield. Whittle and Bliss are turning things upside down in Kentucky. Mr. Farwell, the great dry goods merchant of Chicago, has been conducting revival meetings in Wisconsin, and Paxon and Reynolds, from the West, are about to make a tour through Texas for the purpose of holding Sunday school meetings.

We are glad to hear of these instances of zealous devotion and successful labor on the part of laymen. They indicate an abundant and increasing power in the churches, and an extraordinary outpouring of the Holy Spirit. The holy waters, taking their rise in the temple, and for some time flowing through narrower channels, are spreading and advancing. They are growing wider and deeper, overflowing the beds to which they have been so long confined, and carrying life and healing far and wide. Viewed from a prelatical point, these movements are exceedingly irregular, and threaten to sweep away the notion that only ordained men, coming in the line of an unbroken succession from the apostles, are authorized to preach the gospel. God owns their efforts, and tens of thousands are converted by means which some would characterize as unscriptural. Men, untrained in theological seminaries, and without the formality of the imposition of hands, break away from their secular pursuits and go out preaching with the power of another Pentecost. The gospel certainly has lost none of its primitive vigor. It is as young and fresh as when the disciples, being "scattered abroad, went everywhere preaching the word."

So far from its being anything extraordinary that laymen should preach and call men to repentance, the wonder is that more of them are not engaged in the work. After all, what is a layman as distinguished from a minister of the gospel? Is there anything in the religious status of the one or the other which affects the measure of consecration, or that builds an invincible wall of separation between them? It matters not what these unordained men are called, whether evangelists, revivalists, exhorters or something else, still they are preachers of the gospel, and have credentials as good if not better than the Dean of Canterbury. "Where the Spirit of the Lord is there is liberty." And this movement is doubtless of the Spirit. It is the repeated fulfillment of the prophecy, to be recognized now even as it was in the opening of the gospel dispensation: "And it shall come to pass in the last days, saith God, I will pour out of my Spirit upon all flesh; and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, and your young men shall see visions, and your old men shall dream dreams; and on my servants and on my handmaidens I will pour out in those days of my Spirit; and they shall prophesy." The realization of such a state of things as Peter's interpretation of Joel indicates, would be very shocking indeed to a modern churchman, and some of a more liberal school might have their doubts concerning demonstrations savoring so much of disorder. The priesthood of the people seems to be in this and in other inspired declarations: "But ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a peculiar people."

Methodism from the beginning has recognized, fostered and developed lay preaching. The most of Mr. Wesley's helpers were men fresh from the people, and many of them while preaching continued as laymen, and were more or less engaged in their secular callings. Our local preachers are mostly laymen, and authorized as laymen to preach. It has ever been our testimony and polity as a church to favor and cultivate this element of usefulness and power. The present movement looks very much like a revival of lay preaching, and we hope it may extend until thousands more shall be constrained to go to work for Christ, and until all Christians shall feel that they are to take an active part in bringing the people to the Savior.

The power of the churches is mostly dormant, and lies slumbering in the laity. The capacity for praise, for prayer, for preaching and for personal influence in the membership is nearly all lost. To bring this out, to cultivate and direct it for the conversion of souls, should be the study and aim of the ministry. These noted lay evangelists do this, and their position favors their success, because they better know the heart of the people, and the paramount importance of bringing all their gifts to the service of Christ.

We pray that the Spirit of prophesying may come down upon our Christian people in connection with the Spirit of grace and of supplication, and that the tongue of fire may be given to the churches as signally as in the apostolic days.

Letter from Brazil.

SALTINHO, Prov. of Santo Paulo, Brazil, February 12, 1875.

BRO. HARP: The NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE still comes to me almost as regularly as in days of the past, when my postoffice was in the States; and, as it is the only religious paper that reaches me regularly, I assure you it is much prized by all my family. Through its columns I keep somewhat posted in regard to those brethren in the ministry with whom I was identified for more than twenty years.

And now that I am speaking of the ADVOCATE, I must say one thing about it, even if the editor should see it. I always read the editorials, and usually with much profit. They are the best part of the paper. There is at least one Christian family in this far-off land to whom those editorials are a monthly blessing. May God bless the editor, and long spare him to write for the comfort and edification of God's people.

I have anxiously looked for something in the ADVOCATE to encourage my hope of the establishment of a mission in this empire by the Southern Church, but I have seen nothing as yet. On the contrary, I see that the missionary contributions of the several Conferences are so small that the Missionary Board will in all probability be able to do nothing for this country for years to come. Hence I have concluded to call the attention of those in authority in the Methodist Episcopal Church to this important field, so strangely unoccupied by every division of the great Methodist family.

I am further encouraged to do this by the fact that, although the Northern Presbyterians were the first to enter this field, they gave a hearty and brotherly welcome to their Presbyterian brethren of the South when they came here four years ago, and the men sent by the two Boards of Missions work together as brethren of one Christian family; and yet are their church organizations separate and distinct. Among these Christian people and their ministers there is real Christian fraternity in this empire.

Dr. Wilson, secretary of the Board of Missions of the Southern Presbyterian Church, paid a visit to the missions of his church, located in this province, the past month, and I am much mistaken if he does not report most favorably when he returns to his native land. It was pleasant to meet with this veteran missionary and Christian gentleman. May God bless him and the Christian band of true men who are faithfully laboring to spread gospel light over this beautiful but benighted land.

Telegrams inform us of the death of Bismarck—that he was assassinated. How much do the present times remind us of the days of Queen Elizabeth, and of Henry the Fourth, of France! Are we on the eve of another great religious war? Are the horrors of such a war, on a great scale, to come upon this generation? Of one thing we may be sure—Rome has deliberately adopted her line of conduct. It is now more than twenty years since she plainly indicated her course. In the former times the kings of the earth were on her side—Italy, Spain, and the German empire of that day, and France in the main. It is quite different now. But God rules over all, and he doeth all things well.

Yours in Christian love,
J. E. NEWMAN.

A Conference Organ.

It seems from the following resolution, says the Western Methodist, that the Baltimore Conference is holding this matter under consideration. "At the session just held in Washington city (we quote) "a resolution was adopted appointing T. J. Magruder, Charles Shipley, Y. D. Wilson, W. P. Conway, Jesse B. Wilson, William Milnes, Jr., Rev. Dr. Dabney Ball, Rev. Dr. Atticus W. Wilson and Rev. Dr. R. R. S. Hough to consider the practicability of publishing a Conference organ, with Rev. Dr. Wilson as editor and Rev. E. F. Busey, Rev. Dr. D. Ball, Rev. C. K. Cox, as an editorial committee."

For some time it has been doubted whether our worthy cotemporary—the Episcopal Methodist—represented the sentiment of that region. This action, with some other things that transpired at the Conference, tends to confirm the doubt.

No paper or persons can work up a party among Southern Methodists on the issue of fraternity with Northern Methodism. The action of our General Conference on that subject was decisive, and by it we all abide. Baltimore is firm and true to the attitude of our church as then defined. The wisdom and prudence of the deliverance, in the report that was adopted, and has gone into history, is made clearer by time. Any attempt to rally and band together those who voted for a minority report, however delicately made, will find no favor with the persons so complimented. Our church is a unit on that subject. Here and there an individual may weaken and flicker, and be ready for fraternity on any terms, but he will have no following.

THE Nashville Christian Advocate of March 27 says: "We worshiped last Sunday at Elm Street. Though the weather was forbidding, we found Bro. F. R. Hill the pastor, Bro. McCarty, the superintendent, and his aids in the Sunday school, with over three hundred young folks, as busy as bees, and as tuneful as birds. They have made a handsome addition to their basement, and beautified the edifice. The school is very flourishing, and is continually furnishing recruits to the church, whose membership has greatly increased. We congratulate them on their prosperity."

STATUES are about to be erected in Edinburg of Dr. Livingstone and Sir James Simpson. The sites chosen are St. Andrew's square and Prince's street.

Baltimore Conference Items.

The special order was taken up—the action of the General Conference, held at Louisville in May last, changing the rules by striking out on page 27 of the Discipline the words, "Drunkenness or drinking spirituous liquors" and inserting, "Making, buying, selling or using, as a beverage, intoxicating liquors"—thereby

MAKING THE TEMPERANCE RULE MORE STRINGENT.

The question was taken on adopting the rule, and it was agreed to by a vote of 65 clerical, 13 lay—78; nays, 47 clerical, 4 lay—51. The result will be certified to the General Conference. A number of those who voted in the negative took occasion to explain their votes, stating that they were temperance men, but deemed the present rule sufficiently strong.

Mr. T. J. Magruder submitted the report of the joint board of finance, showing assessments and collections for Bishops, superannuated and educational funds; the total of Washington district being $245 assessment for Bishops' fund, $220 paid; $925 superannuated, $758 paid; $400 educational, $271.16 paid. The total assessments to the Conference were: For Bishops' fund, $1,531, of which $1,257.99 has been paid; superannuated, $4,851—$3,715.07 paid; educational, $2,110—$1,183.50 paid. The totals show a decrease from last year of $198 in the Bishops' fund, $357.93 in the superannuated, and $252 in the educational fund. The deficiency in the funds for the Bishops and the superannuated preachers would be made up by the subscriptions made on Saturday.

Rev. A. W. Wilson submitted the report of the committee on missions. The committee urged more liberality to the mission cause. This Conference had contributed last year but twenty-five cents per church member, and this year but twenty-eight cents. The importance of the mission cause should be urged upon the people by the ministers. The address of the committee was ordered to be printed in pamphlet form, and Bishop Marvin spoke with ardor on behalf of the missions.

The committee on church papers then made a report. The majority report was in favor of indorsing the Baltimore Christian Advocate, the minority in favor of giving equal chances to the Advocate and the Episcopal Methodist of Baltimore.

W. G. Eggleston moved to table the majority report, which was not agreed to by a vote of 47 to 69. N. Head then moved to adopt the minority report, but that report was tabled, 81 to 52, and the whole subject indefinitely postponed, 69 to 60.

Rev. David Thomas asked the Bishop as to the right of a local minister to take charge of an independent church, but the Bishop said that the question was not now before him in proper form.

The committee on statistics made their report, showing 25,265 white and 89 colored members, being an increase of 1,133 white and 13 colored members; 103 local preachers, a decrease of 2 from last year; 1,532 infant baptisms—increase, 262; 1,272 adult baptisms—increase, 142; 313 churches—decrease, 11, but an increase in value of $39,560; parsonages, 60—increase, 6, the value increasing $16,690; Sunday schools, 407, an increase of 30; teachers, 3,113, an increase of 136; scholars, 21,032, an increase of 853; conversions in Sunday schools, 1,089, a decrease of 126; library books, 54,617, an increase of 3,516; Sunday school expenses, $8,482.81, a decrease of $181.91.

Rev. John Polsal was appointed editor of the Baltimore Episcopal Methodist, and a committee was appointed to consider the practicability of establishing an organ of the Conference, with Rev. A. W. Wilson as editor.

THE death of the Rev. J. W. Roberts, Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Africa, is announced. It was not unexpected, for it was known in this country that he was unable to attend the session of the Annual Conference which was to meet January 19. His health had been failing for a long time.

Bishop Roberts was born at Petersburg, Virginia. He was chosen Bishop by the Liberia Conference in 1856, to succeed Bishop Burns. He soon afterward sailed for the United States, and was ordained in St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal Church, on the twenty-fifth of June, by Bishops Janes and Scott, assisted by Father Boehm and Drs. Holdich, Carlton, Porter and Harris. Immediately after he sailed again for the field of his future labors, the results of which for the first year elicited from the secretaries of the Missionary Society the following record: "Our correspondence from Africa is more satisfactory the last year than during any former year, and it has satisfied us of the activity and success of the missionaries generally, and of Bishop Roberts in particular." From that period onward to the close of his life the Bishop's health, much undermined by many years of previous hard and faithful service, steadily declined, and with it the work also suffered.—Methodist.

DEATH OF A VENERABLE MOTHER IN ISRAEL.—We are pained to report, says the Southern Christian Advocate, the death of Mrs. Mary R. Burke, mother of the assistant editor of this paper, which occurred on the seventeenth ultimo, at the residence of her son-in-law, James Young, Esq., of Oglethorpe county, Georgia. At the time we write we are without particulars beyond the simple announcement by telegram; but as the family here had received no intimation of serious illness, the presumption is that the event was sudden, and that our aged sister—who had she lived two days longer, would have entered upon her seventy-second year—was gathered almost in the twinkling of an eye, "like a shock of corn cometh in in his season," to the glorified home for which most of her long life had been spent in preparation. Grief, in such a case as this, is gilded by meditation upon the unspeakable calm of the departed saint.

A Precious Priest.

One of the Roman Catholic priests in this city, Mr. Walker, says the New York Observer, said last Sabbath in his pulpit that he would as soon administer the sacraments of the church to a dog as to those Catholics who send their children to the public schools. The Herald says that "in announcing that next Sunday's collection would be for the benefit of the parochial schools he took occasion to denounce the public school system of New York in the most bitter manner. 'Woe be to the parents,' shouted he in the manner of one hurling anathemas, 'woe be to the parents who send their children to these public schools! Woe be to those who secretly favor them in their hearts! I would not like to be in their places on the day of judgment. The public schools are the nurseries of vice. They are godless schools, and they who send their children to them cannot expect the mercy of God. They ought not to expect the sacraments of the church in their dying moments. I hope you and I will live to see the day when it will be understood that parents who commit this great sin will be refused the sacraments of the church. "What! let them die without the rites of the church?" you ask. Yes, I say so. I would as soon administer the sacraments to a dog as to such Catholics. Did not Jesus Christ suffer one of his apostles to die without the rites of the church in despair? So would I let these wretched Catholics perish. Catholics! They are no Catholics. They are Catholics of the pothouse politician stripe—men who deceive and betray the poor, ignorant, innocent Irish emigrants when they arrive in this country; men who make their poor countrymen, when they are only a few months in this country, perjure themselves to become citizens; men who have no faith or charity in their hearts."

Death of Rev. B. F. Perdue.

The following note brings us the sad intelligence of the death of an old member of the Alabama Conference. Bro. Perdue was one of the veterans of the cross, and had nearly reached the allotted threescore and ten. It was his good fortune to be permitted to work effectively up to the last, ceasing at once to work and live.

SYKES' MILLS, Elmore Co., Ala.

MR. EDITOR: It becomes my sad duty to record the death of our much-loved and worthy pastor, Rev. B. F. Perdue, who died of pneumonia, near Sykes' Mills, Elmore county, Alabama, on the morning of the tenth of March, 1875, in the sixty-seventh year of his age. Uncle Perdue was an humble, quiet, consistent Christian gentleman, full of religious zeal, with an unwavering faith, fully exemplified in his last end. He lived revered and esteemed by all who knew him, and much beloved by the members of his charge.

He leaves a wife to mourn his loss. May she receive comfort from on high and remembrance in the prayers of the righteous.

C. M. LYNCH.

HEALTH OF THE VENERABLE HENRY BOEHM.—Father Boehm, says the New York Christian Advocate, was very feeble last week, and for much of the time confined to his bed. He had desired to accept a warm invitation to meet the New Jersey Conference in New Brunswick, where he attended a Conference in 1809, when there were no Methodists there. He also desired to visit Smyrna, the seat of the Wilmington Conference, where he met the Philadelphia Conference in 1800. Should he be able to be present, his centennial sermon, appointed a year ago for the next session of the Newark Conference, will be delivered in Trinity church, Jersey City. Our aged father now lacks about two months of being one hundred years old.

New Orleans District Conference.

The New Orleans District Conference will meet at the Carondelet Street church, New Orleans, on Thursday, April 8, at five o'clock P. M. On Friday night, at half-past seven o'clock, there will be a district love-feast at the Carondelet Street church, to which all the Methodists of the district are earnestly invited. On Sunday afternoon, April 11, at four o'clock, the regular anniversary of the district Sunday schools will be held. Bishop Paine will be present and preside at the District Conference.

J. B. WALKER, P. E.

Sunday School Celebration.

The twenty-ninth anniversary of the New Orleans District Sunday School Union of the Methodist Episcopal Church South will be celebrated on Sunday, the eleventh day of April, 1875, in the Caroudelet Street church, commencing at four o'clock P. M. Addresses will be delivered by Rev. Bishop Paine, Rev. J. A. B. Ahrens and Rev. John Wilkinson. Music by the children, as usual.

On Saturday, the tenth of April, the schools will all meet at the same place and hour (four o'clock P. M., prompt) to practice their songs together.

W. H. FOSTER, Prest.

MEN who are confined in their thoughts and affections to the narrow circle of self, and self at second-hand, cannot give advice to those who are out of that circle, and the world is very apt to confound moderation in discourse and prudence with deep and comprehensive judgment, which rests on a very different basis, and results from far deeper qualities.—Sara Coleridge.

THE Baltimore Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church (North,) Bishop Peck presiding, says the New York Observer, met in Winchester, Virginia, on Wednesday, March 3, and adjourned the following Monday evening. This Conference is one of the largest and most influential in the Methodist connection. It embraces within its bounds Baltimore city and the Federal capital, and numbers among its members some of their most distinguished divines.

The following statistics are of interest: Ministers, 193; churches, 359; members (including probationers,) 32,264; increase of members, 278; Sabbath schools, 349; teachers and scholars, 37,627; parsonages, 73; value of church property, $3,027,600. Much important business, mostly of local interest, was transacted, and with unusual dispatch.

Though a "border" Conference, divided by the issues of the war, and now meeting for the first time within what was once known as the "Southern Confederacy," the members were cordially received and hospitably entertained in Winchester by citizens of every denomination and of all political parties, and crowds of deeply interested spectators attended upon their sessions every day.

A DISPATCH from Toronto announces the death of the venerable Bishop James Richardson, in his eighty-seventh year. He was born in Kingston, Canada, and while an officer in the British navy lost his left arm by a cannon ball, before Oswego, in 1814. In 1819 he joined the Methodist Church, becoming a regular itinerant in 1825. He served as secretary of the Annual and General Conferences in Canada, and, associated with Elder Case, issued the first Discipline for the Methodist Episcopal Church in Canada. In 1832-33 he consented to the change of government in the Conference, but subsequently withdrew, and remited with the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1836. After filling numerous offices in the church he was elected Bishop, and for many years, up to 1874, he had discharged the laborious duties of that position without assistance.—Zion's Herald.

MARRIED.

CHEQUITT–JOHNSTON.—By the Rev. R. H. Adie, at the residence of Mr. Thomas McNicholson, on the ninth of December, 1874, Mr. George Cequett and Mrs. Elney Johnston, all of Caddo parish, Louisiana.

JONES–RHODES.—By the same, at the residence of Dr. L. Rhodes, on the twenty-second of December, 1874, Mr. Charles Jones, formerly of Atlanta, Georgia, and Miss Annie L. Rhodes, of Caddo parish, Louisiana.

HENLEY–COLLIER.—By the same, on the evening of February 25, 1875, at the Methodist parsonage, in Greenwood, Louisiana, Mr. Lewis Henley and Miss Eugenia May Collier, both of Keachie, Louisiana.

FORD–WALKER.—By the same, at the residence of Mr. George Colquitt, on the morning of March 4, 1875, Mr. John D. Ford and Mrs. Judith A. Walker, all of Caddo parish, Louisiana.

HENDERSON–DOCKERY.—By the same, at the residence of Mr. L. B. Dockery, in Caddo parish, Louisiana, on the evening of March 5, 1875, Mr. William Henderson, lately of British Honduras, and Miss Mary Ida Dockery, formerly of Gainer, Texas.

EMERY–McCRACKEN.—By Rev. J. Pipes, March 18, 1875, Mr. James Emery to Miss Lou. E. McCracken.

BEVERLY–LAFLORE.—At the residence of the bride's mother, in the town of Linden, Alabama, on the twenty-third of December, 1874, by Rev. G. F. Ellis, Francis M. Beverly to Miss Leota B. LaFlore.

Publisher's Department.

PAY POSTAGE.—Subscribers whose subscriptions have been paid at the old rates—viz.: two dollars per year—and whose subscriptions run into 1875, are required under the new postage law which goes into effect January 1, to pay postage at the office of mailing. The subscription price hereafter includes the postage. Two cents per month each month that the subscription has to run, will be sufficient to pay for the ADVOCATE.

RISKS ON REMITTANCES.—Money may be sent to the publisher of the ADVOCATE in payment of subscriptions, in amounts not exceeding ten dollars, by registered letter, at his risk. Any amounts may be sent by express or postoffice money order at his risk, provided that in all the above cases the expense of remitting be borne by the person who remits. Otherwise it will be at their own risk.

DOMESTIC PAPER FASHIONS.—"That which is saved is thrice made." There is no telling how much money may be saved by the use of the Domestic patterns, sold by our enterprising neighbor, M. S. Hedrick, Esq., 103 Canal street. Ladies at a distance and in the interior portions of the country may obtain them through the mail, and be independent of professional service in the line of fitting and dressmaking.

FOR FINE BOOTS AND SHOES of all kinds we cannot do better than advise you to go to Bachman's, 18 Camp street, under the City Hotel. Mr. Bachman has a large and splendidly assorted stock, and gives perfect satisfaction to all of his customers in price and style. For particulars see his advertisement under the head of Business Notices.

LUMBER AND SHINGLES.—Messrs. Muncy & Marcy, at 424 and 426 Delord street, have on hand cypress lumber, ash wood and oak staves. These gentlemen have every facility for furnishing their customers, and any of our friends who may wish to buy are advised to give them a call. Their advertisement will be found on this page.

LEATHER STORE.—A. F. Ricau, Esq., at No. 80 Customhouse street, invites attention to his domestic and imported calf, kip, morocco, sheep skins and shoe findings. Purchasers, in our opinion, will be consulting their own interest by calling and examining for themselves.

THOMAS MARKEY, undertaker, 40, 42 and 44 Claiborne street, offers inducements to parties making purchases in his line. See advertisement.

WE CALL the attention of our lady readers to the card of Mme. C. Samson, milliner, 605 Magazine street.

BARNUM'S HOTEL, ST. LOUIS, MO. We clip from a St. Louis exchange the following complimentary but well-deserved notice of Barnum's Hotel, an advertisement of which will be found in our columns:

"Barnum's Hotel.—Colonel L. A. Pratt, proprietor of Barnum's Hotel, since purchasing Mr. Theron Barnum's interest, has made important improvements in this house, and has others in prospect. Barnum's Hotel has long had the reputation, and justly too, of being one of the best hotels in the West, and it will continue to deserve the patronage of the public as a first-class house. It is centrally located, has all the modern conveniences, and sets the best table to be found in the city."

WOOD, COAL AND CHARCOAL.—We call attention to the fine wood yard of W. N. Packard, Esq., corner of Ursulines and Rampart streets, where either of the above articles may be procured at short notice, and wood will be sawed and split according to order and on reasonable terms.

CANAL STREET, CITY PARK AND LAKE RAILROAD.—The importance of this road is apparent to all, especially to property owners below Canal street and in the rear suburbs of the city. For board of directors and officers see advertisement.

DIRECT LINE TO FRANCE.—See the advertisement of the General Trans-Atlantic Company's mail steamships. A vessel leaves every alternate Saturday for Havre. Excursion tickets at reduced rates.

CELEBRATED

FOR THE CURE OF

LIVER COMPLAINT,

DYSPEPSIA AND SICK HEADACHE.

Symptoms of a Diseased Liver.

PAIN in the right side, under the edge of the ribs, increase on pressure; sometimes the pain is in the left side; the patient is rarely able to lie on the left side; sometimes the pain is felt under the shoulder-blade, and it frequently extends to the top of the shoulder, and is sometimes mistaken for a rheumatism in the arm. The stomach is affected with loss of appetite and sickness; the bowels in general are costive, sometimes alternative with lax; the head is troubled with pain, accompanied with a dull, heavy sensation in the back part. There is generally a considerable loss of memory, accompanied with a painful sensation of having left undone something which ought to have been done. A slight, dry cough is sometimes an attendant. The patient complains of weariness and debility; he is easily startled, his feet are cold or burning, and he complains of a prickly sensation of the skin; his spirits are low; and although he is satisfied that exercise would be beneficial to him, yet he can scarcely summon up fortitude enough to try it. In fact, he distrusts every remedy. Several of the above symptoms attend the disease, but cases have occurred where few of them existed, yet examination of the body, after death, has shown the LIVER to have been extensively deranged.

AGUE AND FEVER.

DR. C. M'LANE'S LIVER PILLS, IN CASES OF AGUE AND FEVER, when taken with Quinine, are productive of the most happy results. No better cathartic can be used, preparatory to or after taking Quinine. We would advise all who are afflicted with this disease to give them A FAIR TRIAL.

P. S. Dealers and Physicians ordering from others than Fleming Bros. will do well to write their orders distinctly, and take none but Dr. C. M'Lane's Liver Pills, prepared by Fleming Bros., Pittsburgh, Pa., the market being full of base imitations. To those wishing to give them a trial, we will forward per mail, post paid, to any part of the United States; one box of Pills for twelve three-cent postage stamps, or one vial of Vermifuge for fourteen three-cent stamps. All orders from Canada must be accompanied by twenty cents extra.

A SPRING SONG.

Violet, violet, blue and sweet,
Nestling down by the old oak's feet,
Can it be you are glad to grow,
Nobody near, your grace to know?
Whispered the violet, soft as air:
"God can look at me anywhere."

Blossom white on the waving tree,
Low to-morrow your place may be,
Crushed, perhaps, 'neath a careless tread—
A faded flower. The blossom said:
Promise of God was never broken:
I am content to be b s token."

Robin, singing your heart's delight,
What may happen before the night?
Foolish thing, of such joy possessed,
Over a tiny, leaf hid nest!
"Why should I not in gladness sing?
I am a robin, and this is spring!"

Little brook, from the ice-chain free,
Dancing off to the boundless sea,
Rippling and foaming in sheer delight,
Sparkling and dimpling till out of sight,
Why should your rapture overflow?
"My cup is crystal, and full to the rim."

Heart, that cannot, for cares that press,
Sing with the bird, or thy Maker bless
As the flowers may, blooming sweet,
With never an eye but God's to greet
Their beauty and freshness, learn to trust!
Lift thy thought from the earthly dust!

Robin and blossom, and violet blue,
Singing and shining with morning dew,
Have they no lesson for one like thee?
God, who loves even them, will see
How thou art trying to sing his praise
Out of the gloom of thy shadowed days.

FOR THE ADVOCATE.

Grandpa Goodale Stories.—No. 5.

CONCERNING TOADS.—CONTINUED.

MY DEAR CHILDREN: I began to tell you last night about the toads with houses on their backs, but bed-time came before I could finish.

I told you that I saw them near the Surinam river, in Dutch Guiana, in South America. How many of you have looked the place out on the map? No one but Harry! Let me advise you, whenever you hear of any new place, to always look it out on the map, and then you will seem to see just where it is. I expect now that Tom has been looking up Surinam toads in his natural history to-day. How is that, Master Tom?

"Yes, I looked them up, grandpa, and I find that they belong to the family pipidæ, which constitutes the group of phrynaglosses, so named from having no tongues, as distinguished from the phanoroglosses, which have tongues."

Here a chorus of voices breaks in: "Now, Tom, you just hush and let grandpa tell us about them. Who wants to hear all those long names?"

Well, children, I will try to describe them to you just as I saw them. As I told you last night, it was in 1836, when there was much less known about South America than now. I may tell you about my trip there some other time, and how I happened to go. Just now we will talk about the toads.

You know I was always very fond of looking up new things, such as animals, birds and flowers; and, no matter how ugly it looked, I always thought that if the good God could afford to make it I could certainly afford to examine into its habits. Well, I had gotten up quite a reputation among the sailors on board the ship in this line, and whenever they went out on any foraging party they were pretty sure to bring in to me any new or strange plant or small animal that they came across. Indeed I often had to caution them to be careful not to get bitten, for the clever fellows were so anxious to please me that they would have picked up a viper, I really believe, had they come across one. Never mind, Tom; you can tell us about vipers some other time. We'll stick to the toads now. Well, one day they came in with a fine lot of game; they had had an unusually successful hunt, so far as numbers and variety were concerned, though the only birds they had shot that were fit to eat were the peacock and the Muscovy duck; but they had plenty of birds of most brilliant plumage, many of which I skinned, and afterward stuffed and mounted.

Well, after I had told them the names of all the different birds, one old sailor said:

"And now, doctor"—they always called me doctor—"here is a queer little creature we have brought to you, and sure it will puzzle you to fix a name to it."

And he opened a tin box that I had given them in which to secure any doubtful creature they might find, and out jumped the funniest toad you ever saw. It was a long time before we could catch it, for, to tell the truth, we were all of us a little afraid of it; but at last a sailor threw his hat over it, and then we managed to work it under a glass bowl which I had often used before in similar cases.

As soon as I got a good look at it I knew that we need not be afraid of the ugly-looking creature, for they live in the houses of the natives of that country, who even eat them. Convenient, isn't it, to have your dinner hopping round the floor? And I told the boys that it was the "Surinam toad," and a fine specimen of the female. It was about a medium-sized toad, with very long hind legs and very short fore legs; could jump a long distance; indeed in these particulars it was more like a frog than a common toad, but I knew it to be a toad, because it had no teeth and was not web-footed. It had the funniest-shaped head you ever saw; its head looked like the three-cornered hats you see in the pictures of George Washington, and its eyes, which were so small you could scarcely see them, were so near its mouth you might have thought she was about to swallow them. But the strangest things of all were the little houses on the toad's back. These were small lumps not larger than a bean, but each little lump had a little toad in it that, when it got large enough to take care of itself, would lift up the roof of its little house and hop out, and never go back any more.

Now, in order for you to realize how very strange this was, you must know how ordinary toads and frogs are produced. Can you tell us about this, Master Tom?

"Yes, grandpa. Frogs and toads are both oviparous and metamorphostical."

That is all very true, Tom, but I see that Charlie is shaking his fist at you. Little folks don't like those long words, you know.

"I mean," says Tom, "that they lay eggs, and hatch out not toads and frogs, but tadpoles, which after awhile change to toads or frogs."

"Ire tell 'em," says Charlie.

Yes, I know you have, you little fellow, for I caught you playing with some only the other day, and you had taken them out of the water and put them on the ground, where I found some of them quite dead. You see tadpoles can't live out of the water and toads can, and yet tadpoles are the children, so to speak, of toads. Well, now, the strangest thing about these Surinam toads is that, when the mother lays her eggs, the father toad picks them up and puts them on the mother toad's back and her back grows up into little houses over each egg, and the egg hatches, not into a fish-like tadpole, as is the case with other toads, but into a perfectly-formed toad, that has legs and looks just like a large toad, and can live on the land, and he just knocks off the roof of his house and jumps out and makes his own living. What do you little folks think of that?

"I think it is right funny," says Harry.

Yes, and you will find that there are many things worth learning about even the humblest little creatures which our heavenly Father has made. Remember, whenever you are about to place your foot on even a worm: "This is the result of a thought of God."

"But, grandpa, how about the toads that can sing?"

Oh, yes, I remember I promised to tell you about them; but they are frogs, and not toads; they are our old friends, the hylæ or tree-frogs, only a variety which is found near Rio Janeiro.

"But, grandpa, do they really sing?"

Well, my dear, their voices are not quite up to the canary or the bob-o'-link, but when compared with the bull-frog, for example, they are quite musical. I used to sit and listen to them every evening, and for a long time I supposed they were birds.

Do you think now, my children, that toads are worth talking about?

"Yes, grandpa," Harry says; "but they are ugly-looking things for all that."

It is not their fault that they are ugly; they do their best to get rid of their rough-looking skins, even to eating them all up now and then. You think I am joking, but I am not, for every few months their skin splits open and comes off in two pieces, and as soon as ever the toad spies it he gobbles it down. I haven't time to-night to tell you about all the many strange notions they used to have about toads and frogs. When I was a boy, if any one killed a frog they used to say:

"Now your cows will give bloody milk to-night."

Many people believed that toads were poisonous even to look at, and yet in very old times it was thought that they possessed one highly redeeming quality—a jewel in the head, of great value, as it was supposed to be a cure for every disease.

Tom, please hand me that Shakespeare on the table, or you can turn to the place just as well; it is in "As You Like It, Act II, Scene I," I have marked the passage for you.

"Here it is, grandpa; shall I read it?"

Yes, and the foot-note at the bottom of the page:

"Sweet are the uses of adversity,
Which like a toad, ugly and venomous,
Wears yet a precious jewel in his head."

The foot-note is:

"Fenton, in 1569, tells us 'there is found in heads of old and great toads a stone which they call borax or steton; it is most commonly found in the head of a he-toad.'—Knight."

You have read correctly, but both Shakespeare and Fenton, to say nothing about Knight and the commentator, were wrong. It is now known that the so-called "jewel" did not come from the toad at all, but was the tooth of a fossil fish called pycnodus.

It was also supposed by many that toads have been found encased in solid rock and in the heart of trees, where they had been for hundreds of years without food or air; and this strange story some people believe even now.

You will learn, children, as you grow older, not to judge things merely by their looks. Toads were supposed to be poisonous because of their hideous appearance, and yet the very ugliest of them are eaten by some men. But hand me the Shakespeare, Tom, quick, for I see mamma coming, and I want to read you one more extract about toads, to show you how they were used by the old sorcerers. Here it is in "Macbeth, Act IV, Scene I:"

"First witch—
Round about the cauldron go,
In the poisoned entrails throw,
Toad that under cold stone
Day and nights has thirty-one
Sweltered venom sleeping got,
Boil thou first i' the charmed pot."

And now good-night.

GRANDPA GOODALE.

RENOVATING BITTERS!!

Purify the Blood.

STRENGTHEN, INVIGORATE AND RENOVATE SYSTEM.

One of the best remedies known for the speedy cure of

DYSPEPSIA.

Loss of Appetite, Sour Stomach, Flatulence, Heartburn, Nausea, Fluttering of the Heart, Fainting Sensations, Sudden Flushes of Heat, Depression of Spirits or Melancholy, Water Brash, and Chronic or Nervous Debility. They are Diuretic, Tonic, Alterative and Stimulant. They perfectly eradicate all Bilious disorders arising from a foul stomach, strengthening the system and regulating the functions of the Liver.

Any one suffering with Weak Nerves, Deranged Liver, Kidney Complaint, Loss of Appetite, Fever and Ague, or any of the diseases or symptoms enumerated above, can be materially benefited and entirely cured by the use of these Bitters.

FOR FEMALES.

It is an established fact that fully one-half of the females are in bad health; or, in other words, never feel well. Many suffer with inward weakness. They feel languid, devoid of energy, extremely nervous, and have no appetite. To this class the Renovating Bitters are especially recommended. Such patients should resort to the use of these Bitters, the invariable result of which will be a strong and healthy constitution, a disappearance of all nervousness, a good appetite and a perfect restoration to health.

Thousands have testified to the merits of these Bitters. I would strongly advise all suffering with the above-named complaints to try them and be convinced.

Full directions accompany each bottle. Price, $1 per bottle, or six bottles for $5.

RESTORATION OF THE JEWS. With the political destiny of the nations of the earth, as foretold in the prophecies of Scripture. A readable volume of 204 pages.	1 00	60
SHERLOCK ON DIVINE PROVIDENCE, 336 pages. This is an admirable volume, just placed among the standard works of the Church. It has been carefully edited, and we commend it to the notice of all who wish to disseminate sound and enlightened views on this important subject.	1 50	1 00
SYSTEMATIC BENEFICENCE. Three prize essays on "The Great Reform, The Great Question and Property Consecrated."	75	50
TRAVIS, REV. JOSEPH, AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF. Embracing a succinct History of the Methodist Episcopal Church South in part of Western Virginia, the Carolinas, Georgia, Alabama and Mississippi, with short Memoirs of several Local Preachers. As its title indicates, this is a most interesting volume, and is written in a colloquial style, suited to the character of the book. An excellent engraved likeness of the author adorns the volume.	1 25	75
VIEWS FROM NATURE, with thirty-eight beautiful Engravings. Containing brief sketches of the most notable events in our country's history, monuments, bridges, Niagara Falls, seasons and months. A handsome volume, and an entertaining work for the young.	75	50
WESLEY, LIFE OF REV. JOHN, by Watson. With Observations on Southey's Life of Wesley. It is scarcely necessary to say that the "Life" is the most judicious biography of Wesley, and the "Observations" are the most able defense of Wesley and Methodism ever written. This edition has been carefully revised from the last London edition, and a few editorial notes added. 530 pp.	2 00	1 25
WINANS' DISCOURSES on Fundamental Religious Subjects. Including a Preliminary Discourse on the Divine Revelation of the Holy Scriptures. An octavo volume, of 589 pages, of more than usual interest.	3 00	2 00

New Orleans Markets.

From the New Orleans Price Current.

The river is 5 feet 1 inch below high-water mark.

COTTON.—The following are the arrivals since the twenty-sixth ultimo:

Mississippi river and bayous	2,311
Red river	1,919
Ouachita river	881
Railroads	1,313
Lake	3
Mobile	104
Texas	127
Florida	3
Total	6,751

On Saturday, notwithstanding the suspension of dispatches from Liverpool and New York, the market opened with a good inquiry, and although factors assumed a higher tone, their stringent pretensions did not prevent a fair business during the morning, the sales up to twelve M. embracing 2,000 bales, after which the movement continued to exhibit a considerable decree of animation, the further transactions summing up 4,000 bales, making a total of 6,000. On Monday, with nothing in the dispatches from New York to have much influence, and none from Liverpool, where the Easter holiday was on hand, the market was quiet throughout the day, with only a moderate demand, while the movement was checked by the high pretensions of factors, most of whom asked above quotations. The business was of moderate extent, embracing 3,881 bales, and showed no quotable variation, but it would have been impracticable for buyers to go on to any considerable extent unless at higher figures. Good staple kinds in particular were held at what buyers regarded as extreme rates, and certain descriptions which were scarce and wanted commanded ⅛@⅛c. above the ruling rates. On Tuesday the movement was checked by rainy weather, discouraging telegrams from Liverpool, lower futures at New York, and a heavy decline in sterling exchange, and, there being only a limited demand, it was impracticable to effect sales unless at some concessions. The business was confined to 2,350 bales.

The above makes an aggregate for the past three days of 12,150 bales, against 19,750 for the corresponding time last week and 15,956 the week before.

The receipts proper at this port since the first of September, exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas, are 920,658 bales, against 1,093,339 bales to the same date last year, and the decrease in the receipts at all the ports up to the latest mail dates, as compared with last year, is 191,271 bales. The decrease by the reports per telegraph is 197,218—3,190,657 against 3,387,915. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same date last year, there is an increase of 37,456 bales to Great Britain, and a decrease of 21,06 to France and 76,463 to other foreign ports. We quote:

Advertisers' Directory

OF THE

NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

Alphabetically Arranged Under the Heads of the Business or Articles Advertised.

NOTE.—We take no advertisements except from those who we have good reason to believe are respectable and reliable. The publisher urges his solicitor and agents to seek the advertisements of the most worthy and reliable representatives in every branch of business, and not to apply to or accept business from persons of doubtful character. We have refused business to the extent of thousands of dollars each year for want of satisfactory information in reference to applicants. We think we may safely claim for the list below that it embraces, as a rule, the very best men and firms in the different branches represented.

News of the Week.

DOMESTIC.

HAZLETON, PA., April 1.—The excitement at Upper Lehigh yesterday, during the raid of the miners, was intense, and during their stay there was a perfect reign of terror. It seems that they divided their force before entering the town, some coming at the east end and others at the west, thus cutting off the retreat of the citizens. Shots were fired indiscriminately without any order, many of the crowd being intoxicated.

At the hotel a violent demonstration was made. The rioters went through the house, endeavoring to force the landlord and boarders to join their ranks. Some of the inmates took refuge in a cellar, while others escaped through the back door. The company's store was also attacked. The superintendent and clerks escaped, but the rioters fired shots into the building. Persons riding along the highway were stopped and were fired at when they refused to join. The mob expected from Schuylkill county did not reach Audenried. Riots are reported at Ashland, with the loss of several lives. All quiet here now.

NEW YORK, April 1.—Beecher was on the stand in the scandal case to-day. His testimony thus far is irrelevant to the scandal, being for the greater part a history of his career as an editor and a theologian.

WASHINGTON, April 3.—Rear Admiral Mullany, commanding the North Atlantic station, reports to the Secretary of the Navy that at Havana the yellow fever is prevailing to an alarming extent; that on board two Spanish vessels there were seventy-six cases down. In view of the fact, Secretary Robeson yesterday ordered the steamer Fortune, which has been making surveys around the Island of Cuba, to return home. He also ordered all the vessels at Key West to proceed to Port Royal, South Carolina, with the exception of the Plymouth, Ossipee and Shawmut, which were ordered to take a cruise.

YANKTON, April 4.—Great excitement here to-day on the arrival of two men direct from the Black Hills party that started from Springfield about February. They had in their possession several nuggets and particles of gold taken from the soil with an ax. They are fully satisfied that gold exists there in paying quantities, and have returned for provisions and implements. They will start soon with a company they intend to raise here, traveling by the Niobrara.

KEY WEST, April 4.—To the Secretary of the Treasury, Washington: From newspapers received here to-day I learn that imputations are cast upon me indirectly for failing to inform the department of the existence of the so-called yellow fever epidemic at this port. I now confirm my dispatch of yesterday, after consultation with the health officer, and state positively that no case of yellow fever exists in this city, in the vicinity or on shipboard.

The cases referred to in my dispatch, if yellow fever at all, which is strongly doubted by many who have had the disease, were simply sporadic. The city is perfectly healthy, with no symptoms of disease, and no cause for quarantining steamers touching at this port.

F. F. WICKER,
Collector of Customs.

KEY WEST, April 4.—We have had four cases of yellow fever here. None are existing. The weather is cool and the city healthy.

J. F. HARRIS, M. D.,
Health Officer.

HARTFORD, April 5.—Forty towns in the State give Charles R. Ingersoll, Democrat, for Governor, 11,158 votes; James Lloyd Green, Republican, 8,808, and Henry D. Smith, Prohibitionist, 792.

Last year the same towns gave Ingersoll, Democrat, 9,808; Harris, Republican, 7,828; Smith, Prohibitionist, 941.

Ingersoll is probably elected by the people.

The Legislature, as far as heard from, is about the same as last year.

CINCINNATI, April 5.—The election to-day was very exciting, and the vote polled is the heaviest ever known. There was considerable turbulence at the polls, but nothing of a serious nature is reported. At this hour (eleven P. M.) it is believed the Democrats have elected their entire ticket by majorities ranging from 1,000 to 6,000, Johnson, for mayor, receiving the heaviest vote. The official returns are coming in slowly.

HARTFORD, April 6.—The total vote is as follows: Ingersoll, Democrat, 53,784; Green, Republican, 44,256; Smith, Prohibitionist, 2,674. The Democrats carry the first Congressional district by 488 majority, the second by 1,500 majority, the fourth by 2,235 majority. The Republicans carry the third by 791 majority. The Senate is Democratic by 15 to 6. The House is largely Democratic.

FOREIGN.

LONDON, April 1.—A special dispatch to the Post from Berlin says a financial crisis is feared there. Settlements on the Bourse are effected with great difficulty. There have been twenty-eight failures, and two persons have committed suicide in consequence of financial reverses.

A special from Berlin to the Post reports that eighty ecclesiastics are at present imprisoned in Posen alone. It is rumored that the government has arrested the papal delegate who has been secretly administering the archbishopric of Posen since the arrest of the incumbent.

TRIESTE, April 3.—The ceremony of unveiling the monument to the memory of the late Emperor Maximilian took place in this city to-day, in the presence of the Emperor Francis Joseph, the archduke, the ministers and an immense concourse of people. Great enthusiasm was exhibited. Speeches were made, dwelling upon the merits of Maximilian and expressing the attachment of the inhabitants of Trieste to the imperial house. The Emperor, who was deeply moved, cordially thanked the people for their manifestations of loyalty.

From the Work.

DELHI CIRCUIT, LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.—Mr. Editor: On the fourth Sunday in March I closed the first round on my circuit, and expected to begin the second on next Sunday, at Delta; but on learning that the cars would soon cease to run through to Delta, on account of high water, I took the cars on yesterday in order to learn the facts in the case. I found the report too true. The most of the surface of the earth between Delhi and Delta is now submerged. The prospect is imminent for another great flood.

Supposing that I would not be able to fill my appointment at Delta for two or three months, I crossed to Vicksburg and requested Bro. Bancroft and Bro. Tidwell to preach to my congregation in Delta on the afternoon of the first Sunday in each month, and they kindly consented to do so; for which they have my hearty thanks.

In this connection I may say that my visit to Vicksburg inspired me with enthusiasm for our mission church there; and I beg to say to my brethren that should you receive the circular signed by Bro. Bancroft and Bro. Tidwell, please give it a generous consideration.

On our return from Delta to-day the water had risen so much that it quenched the fire of our engine some two or three times, so that we had to stop, kindle the fire and raise steam anew. Under such circumstances it is important that the train be under such headway and have so much steam on hand as will carry it through the deep waters.

To my brethren who have been in Madison parish in the days of the prosperity of the church, such as Bro. Trippett and the Bros. Goodwyn, I desire to say: "There is hope of a tree, if it be cut down, that it will sprout again, and that the tender branch thereof will not cease; though the root thereof wax old in the earth, and the stalk thereof die in the ground, yet through the scent of water it will bud, and bring forth boughs like a plant."

B. F. ALEXANDER.

APRIL 2, 1875.

THE OUACHITA STORM.—Last Friday evening a tornado, with a direction from west to east, struck the place of Mr. Reddin, on the Ouachita, in Caldwell parish, with most terrible effects. Sixteen houses were blown down, the fencing carried away, and the dwelling seriously damaged. In a house occupied by Mr. Adair several trunks were carried off, and have not since been found. Mrs. Adair and her son, aged twelve years, were killed, and also a negro man working on the place. Across the river, in the hills, doubtless other serious damage was done. We learn from Dr. Brown that Mr. W. Meriblith was badly wounded, and is not expected to recover.—Ouachita Telegraph.

THE RIVER STAGE.—The Mississippi at this point rose two inches yesterday, and now stands four feet eight inches below the high-water mark of 1874. At Cairo there was a rise of one inch. At Lacrosse a rise of one foot. At St. Louis there was a rise of one inch. At Keokuk there was a fall of three inches, and at Leavenworth a rise of one foot nine inches.—Picayune, April 7.

THE committee of the United Presbyterian General Assembly, appointed for the purpose of corresponding with other religious bodies, in an effort to secure the meeting of a temperance convention, composed of delegates from all evangelical denominations, have officially issued a call for a convention, to be held in Pittsburg, May 12, 1875, at ten A. M.

WE have received a copy of Dr. Bledsoe's review of Bro. Miller's pamphlet, which appeared in the Southern Review for January, 1875, in pamphlet form, from the Southwestern Book and Publishing Company, St. Louis, where it can be had for twenty-five cents.

THE Christian Union says: "It seems rather queer that the first attempts of negroes to take advantage of the new civil rights law should have been made by those who either wanted admission to theaters or to be served with liquor in the saloons."

WITHOUT temperance there is no health, without virtue murder, without religion no happiness.

Prof. Forshey on Lotteries.

The following letter from Prof. Forshey was published in the New Orleans Times of April 2. This lottery business is carried on extensively all over the country, and is the fruitful source of manifold evils. It cannot be too strongly condemned by religious people, nor by any who have the moral and material welfare of society at heart. We are glad to find so just and courageous an exposure of this legalized gambling in a secular journal, and from the pen of a gentleman of Prof. Forshey's ability and character.

EDITOR TIMES: You have referred to me, by request of the Hon. Blanton Duncan, of Kentucky, a matter of mathematical calculation, involving the question of accuracy or fairness of certain prizes in the late drawing of the noted "Louisville Library Lottery."

It is not clear to me how I should be interested in the fairness or the unfairness of said drawing, or in showing my own mastery of the possible combinations on which they depend.

Should my friend, Colonel Duncan (who has not overstated the difficulties of the task, I think,) succeed in proving the "entire list no better than guesswork," he will not create much surprise or increase the deep reprobation in which lotteries of all kinds are held by nearly all communities of advanced civilization and morals.

No moralist or political economist, so far as I am informed, has ventured to defend the lottery method of obtaining people's money without pretending to give an equivalent; nor can it have any claim to approbation above any other species of gambling. If the chances of winning form the basis of estimate, the lottery is the worst species of gambling.

I cannot close this note without uttering my surprise at the number of names of men who have achieved an enviable reputation, at least as patriots and publicists, that have appeared as managers and patrons of the Louisville Library Lottery. Nor can I believe that any of them have much enhanced their good name by attempting to redeem this form of wholesale gambling by the coupling it with a benevolent enterprise.

Collecting of books for reading and culture of the intellect certainly is praiseworthy. So are religion and morals. Would those gentlemen and the Legislature of Kentucky embark in such a lottery for the benefit of the Bible Society, or the Sunday School Union, or the Young Men's Christian Association?—all certainly as much in need of a lottery as the city of Louisville, though perhaps not as able to purchase the privilege.

The liberty of speaking freely from New Orleans is obvious to those who know how our poor are cursed with a similar gambling delusion. Here it is a monopoly. The State has sold for a long term of years her whole gambling franchise to one party, and the consequent distress, dishonesty and utter fleecing of the poor and ignorant, in these times of want, are shocking. The city swarms with lottery offices, and our papers are kept teeming with the tempting persuasions, while the poor laborers, the washerwomen, the servants, with their daily or weekly wages, are fleeced by the lottery agents, even down to the least decimal of a ticket.

That the Louisiana Legislatures of these latter days should sell the birthright or the soul of the State may not be surprising; but Kentucky! O shades of Clay, Rowan and Crittenden! of Robert Breckinridge, Henry Bascom! Let it be proposed to Bishop Kavanaugh to ask the Kentucky Legislature for a lottery for the benefit of the several great enterprises of Episcopal, Catholic or Methodist denominations, and let us have the replies of these great leaders of benevolence, morals and religion.

The Louisville Library, we understand, has a magnitude and splendor unequaled in the Western or Southern States. We fear, however, that the fame of having been endowed, not by voluntary benevolence, but by delusion and gambling, will mar its usefulness for a century to come.

Thanking you, Mr. Editor, and Colonel Duncan for the opportunity I might never have had of uttering my estimate of this and all other gambling, I beg to return the papers inclosed, declining to enter upon the calculations politely invited from "some eminent mathematician."

I remain, very respectfully,
CALEB G. FORSHEY.

HISTORY OF METHODISM IN MISSISSIPPI.—Mr. Editor: If the committee appointed at the last session of the Mississippi Conference "to confer with Rev. John G. Jones and get his History of Methodism in Mississippi published as soon as practicable" would ascertain about what the history will cost per volume, and let us know through the ADVOCATE or otherwise, it would very much facilitate the raising of the money to aid in the publication of said history, to which we pledged ourselves by resolution at the Conference. The preachers can get subscribers for the book without difficulty when they are provided with a proper showing to present to the people. Let us have a prospectus.

Twenty-Fifth Annual Report

OF THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF THE SOUTHWESTERN BIBLE SOCIETY.

To the Southwestern Bible Society—DEAR FRIENDS: Your board of directors have to report that the twenty-fifth year of our existence has been a peculiarly uneventful one.

Twelve months ago we were halted in our colportage work by lack of material for its further prosecution, and up to the present time that work has not been resumed. That we have not continued our efforts to supply the destitution of our field has been owing to a variety of circumstances. A full statement of the embarrassed condition of our affairs was made to the American Bible Society, as indicated in our last report, and in response thereto some $7,500 of our indebtedness to them was at once canceled; leaving us with no further outstanding liabilities than our available resources were considered fully able to meet.

They also, in the same spirit of hearty co-operation, donated us $1,000 worth of books, which, however, owing to misdirection, did not come into our possession until last June. Within a few weeks the same society has indicated its purpose to still further supply us with the material requisite for the most active prosecution of our so long suspended colportage work; but upon application to Mr. W. H. Thomas, our most zealous and efficient superintendent of last year, we find that his services cannot at present be secured. By the labors of Mr. Francis Curran a very limited work has been carried on during the last few months, in the way of carrying the word of life to the destitute of New Orleans. We are not, however, satisfied with such limited operations as these, but are making every possible effort to secure the services of a number of consecrated laborers who will carry the Bibles with which we may supply them to every portion of our field. In accordance, however, with our resolution of last year, this colportage work must be self-sustaining; and until we can find some such experienced organizer and superintendent as Mr. William H. Thomas our efforts cannot keep pace with our desires.

By the hand of death two of our number have been removed during the past year. William N. Mercer, for many years one of our vice presidents, and William M. Perkins, Esq., our recent treasurer, have been called from the scenes of their earthly labors to try the realities of the unseen world.

The transactions of the Bible House during the past year have been as follows:

Stock on hand, November 1, 1873	$2,573 17
Received by donation to November 1, 1874	1,000 00
Received by returns from country Depositories	278 38
		$3,851 55
Sales during the year from house	$359 14
Donations during the year from house	367 25
Life members' privilege	59 06
		785 45
Balance of stock on hand		$3,066 10

We present this very brief report with the hope that the record of the year to come may be such as will go far to compensate for the meager operations of 1874.

Respectfully submitted.

A. H. NELSON,
Cor. Secretary.

MT. VERNON CHURCH, WASHINGTON.—We congratulate the whole church, says the Baltimore Episcopal Methodist of April 3, on the cheering news just received from Washington. The debt which has so long hung upon our noble people at the national metropolis has been provided for chiefly by the enlarged liberality of the creditors. We have not yet received full particulars, but enough has been communicated to justify the announcement, which will be hailed as a jubilee throughout our Zion.

We are indebted to our brother, Rev. E. L. Busey, who has just returned from Washington, for this pleasing information.

THE Reformed Episcopal Church in Chicago, says the Chicago Advance, is marching on. For several weeks past that denomination has been holding services in the old St. John's church, on the West Side, and the outlook is now very encouraging for another church in connection with that body in this city. A meeting for this purpose will be held in the old St. John's church next Monday evening, to which all who are friendly to the enterprise are cordially invited.

BISHOP MARVIN IN LEESBURG.—We have received the gratifying intelligence that the visit of the Bishop to this time-honored stronghold of Methodism in Virginia has proved a signal blessing. A gracious revival is now in progress as the immediate result, under God, of his preaching. We greet the brethren at Leesburg. The Bishop was in Alexandria on Sunday last and preached to a large and appreciative audience.—Episcopal Methodist, April 3.

MR. E. PEARSALL SMITH, the lay preacher, whose home is in Philadelphia, has again sailed for Europe, to continue his evangelistic labors in England and on the Continent. He expects to visit France, where, he says, Protestant teaching is gaining a greater hold upon the attention of the people than at any time for a great many years.

PLEASURE is like treacle—too much of it spells the taste of everything.

From Texas.

MR. EDITOR: It is with joyful step that we hasten to the postoffice every Monday to "strike hands" with an old familiar friend—the ADVOCATE. It visits the home of our childhood, the friends of our youth, the companions of our school days, and the brethren with whom we have preached and worked and prayed. Not unfrequently do we see their names subscribed to interesting and edifying communications in your paper. May the Lord abundantly bless them in their "labor of love!" But among these contributors is an old soldier in the army of the Lord, whom we well know. Truth is his life, truth is his practice, truth is his theme, and "Truth" he signs his name. God help him to give us more truth! And when he does I hope, Mr. Editor, that you will request the Texas Advocate to copy. Our people out here would be pleased with his independent thought, and the manner in which he is wont to "speak the truth boldly."

Some of the preachers of the "older States" think that we have to go from one appointment to another armed to keep off the Indians and other wild animals. But they are mistaken. We are civilized people out here, sir; and not only that, but our people are educated, cultivated and refined. Besides all this, they treat their preacher well, they feed him well, and we believe they are going to pay him well. Our country, fertile and healthy, is being rapidly settled and developed by energetic and enterprising emigrants, and in a few years we hope the vast prairies of our "western realm" will be dotted with dwellings, checkered with fences, and scented with the fragrance of the flower garden, the odor of the cotton bloom and the perfume of the fructifying harvest.

To our friends in Alabama we say that we like Texas. It suits us exactly and we expect to make our home here.

T. R. C.

NAVASOTA, TEXAS, March 22, 1875.

Lay Work.

MR. EDITOR: Rev. George A. Hall, general secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association of Washington, District of Columbia, and Mr. Thos. K. Cree, of the same city, passed through our city, en route to Texas, on Thursday of last week. These gentlemen represent the executive committee of the International Association of the United States and British provinces; and have been holding a series of meetings, of from two to five days each, in a large number of cities of the country, in the interest of lay work, and seeking to incite to special activity for the welfare of young men. They have visited Augusta, Savannah, Columbus, Atlanta, Milledgeville and Macon, Georgia; Jacksonville and Palatka, Florida; Charleston and Columbia, South Carolina; Selma, Montgomery and Mobile, Alabama; and go from here to Houston, Galveston and Austin, Texas; Memphis, Nashville and Chattanooga, Tennessee. These brethren have held union meetings in each place—three meetings daily—prayer, praise and promise meetings, Bible readings and lay preaching services, and have been received everywhere most cordially, the pastors of different denominations uniting in special services, which in Savannah, Columbus, Columbia, Augusta and Mobile were continued after their departure. At Augusta and Savannah large numbers of additions were made to the churches as the result of the effort.

While these brethren represent the Young Men's Christian Association, they do not seek to organize; they simply show the need of consecrated lay effort, and of special, definite work for the young men of our cities and towns, and give, wherever desired, information in regard to those societies.

Alabama is to hold a State convention of associations, in Montgomery, on the twenty-second instant, and the International convention will be held in Richmond, May 26-30. This is the first convention of the united associations held in the South since the war, and it is confidently believed will be the largest and most profitable one of all. This body simply meets to devise ways and means to reach more effectually the young men of the land with good influence, and bring them to the church of Christ.

DIED, in Bastrop, on Monday morning, March 29, 1875, at three o'clock, Clara Caldwell, infant daughter of J. Harvey and Mrs. Eva Brigham, aged seven months.

Books and Periodicals.

THE LIFE OF CHRIST. By Frederic W. Farrar, D. D., F. R. S., late fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, master of Marlboro College and chaplain in ordinary to the Queen. In two volumes. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co., 713 Broadway.

A number of lives of Christ have appeared within the last few years, some of them works of merit. The older works of Fleetwood and Neander, the Life of Our Lord, by Dr. Hanna, and other efforts in the same line, are familiar to our readers. Of all, however, we think the Life of Christ, by Dr. Farrar, is the most complete and satisfactory. The story is most fittingly told in language at once simple, picturesque and glowing. There is a quiet beauty and manly strength of style, and wonderful clearness of statement, combined with descriptive powers of the highest order. The scenes and incidents are brought near and set before us with the freshness and reality of every-day experiences. The work of which it most reminds us is Conybeare and Howson's Life and Times of St. Paul. It is as graphic and entertaining in point of treatment and amplification, and happier in its popular adaptation to the wants of the people generally. It is learned and critical enough; every paragraph indicates that the author has thoroughly surveyed the entire ground, and that he is in possession of every help that could bring out the true conception and import. General culture, ample erudition, theological training, and a splendid imagination, contribute to the author's task, while they do not obtrude unduly. It is not for any one class of readers more than for another. Like the gospel itself, it will be read by all with almost equal interest and profit. Children and grown people, the unlearned and the scholarly, teachers and pupils, will all find entertainment and instruction. It is, for the most part, narrative and historical, not much of the commentary or sermon about it, but the recital of events in their order, and the portraiture of a most unique and wonderful character. It is the life of Christ, and such a delineation as will commend itself to the Christian and to every devout seeker after the truth. The edition, in two volumes, which we have before us, is enriched with many valuable critical notes, and by an appendix of 50 pages, which adds greatly to the worth of the work. There is besides a copious index and a table of passages of Scripture referred to. Altogether the work comprises 985 octavo pages, in clear and large type, on the best of paper, and handsomely bound. The publishers have also issued an edition in one volume octavo, without the notes or appendix, and at half the cost of the edition in two volumes. This, for the most, will be the edition to buy, and is within the reach of nearly all.

THE MOSAIC ACCOUNT OF CREATION, THE MIRACLE OF TO-DAY, OR NEW WITNESSES TO THE ONENESS OF GENESIS AND SCIENCE. By Charles H. Warring. New York: J. W. Schermerhorn & Co., 1875.

The purpose of this work is to compare the statements in the first two chapters of Genesis with the scientific discoveries and conclusions thus far attained. The author is a literalist in his interpretation of Genesis, and he contends that the discoveries of modern science are in harmony with the Mosaic cosmogony. The volume abounds in scientific information and scriptural exegesis, and is written in the interest of the truth. Its perusal will entertain and instruct, and at the same time increase our reverent faith in the word of God.

A MITHER'S GIFT, OR A WREATH FOR MY DARLINGS. Poems by Mrs. Phebe Palmer. New York: W. C. Palmer, Jr., No. 19 Bible House.

This little volume, by Mrs. Palmer, comes out after her death, and thousands who are familiar with her character and prose writings will be glad to see this collection of her poems. The most of the poems are devotional, many of them hymns adapted to public worship, and all are pervaded with the deep spirituality and consecration which characterized the author. Some of them have considerable merit as poems, and will live for a good while in the songs and hymnals of the church.

CROWN OF LIFE. By W. A. Ogden. Toledo, Ohio: W. W. Whitney, 1875.

Another song-book for Sunday schools. It has many songs, new to us, and some very good. It is published in good style.

THE American Agriculturist for April is splendidly illustrated, as usual, and filled with useful information for farmers, housekeepers and planters. We have not seen a better number for years.

CHRIST STILLING THE TEMPEST.

Once upon the heaving ocean
Rode a bark at eventide,
While the waves, in wild commotion,
Dashed against the vessel's side;
Jesus, sleeping on a pillow,
Heeded not the raging billow—
While the winds were all abroad,
Calmly slept the Son of God.

In that dark and stormy hour
Fearful ones awoke the Lord:
Jesus, by his sovereign power,
Calmed the tempest with a word.
On life's dark and restless ocean,
Mid the billow's wild commotion,
Trembling soul, your Lord is there—
He will make you still his care.

Jesus knows your silent weeping
When before his throne you bow;
Never, never is he sleeping
Where he reigns in glory now.
If the world is dark before thee,
If the billows rolling o'er thee
All thy soul with terror fill,
Hear him saying: "Peace, be still."

Letter from Oregon.

BROWNSVILLE, OREGON, March 13, 1875.

MR. EDITOR: My first letter from this far-off land to your paper closed with my arrival at this place (Brownsville.) I now propose to give some supplementary paragraphs for the information of your readers. I will write, first, of Oregon's chief town, near the mouth of the charming Willamette (accent on "lam") river. Commodore Maury, in his most excellent "Manual of Geography," recently published, makes not inconsiderable mistakes with reference to this State, which I wish to point out as I pass along through the windings of my letter, so that the publishers may make the corrections in their next edition. On page 71 he says that "Oregon has no large towns." Now Portland is a large town, having, so I am told, not less than twelve thousand inhabitants. It is handsomely laid out, as far as I could judge; has large blocks of excellent business houses, and beautiful residences, all lighted with gas, together with a superior landing for first-class vessels. The wheels of business are large, numerous, and run rapidly as in any other fast city in its youth. Its foggy mornings and wet streets are much like those of your own great city. There are other considerable towns of growing importance, which promise to be large and influential in the commercial world in due time.

PORTLAND,

BROWNSVILLE,

where I am domiciled, with my household jewels, in the little Southern parsonage—not so fine as that parsonage in your Conference, but at least as comfortable—lies at the foot of the grand old Cascade mountains, while the coast range is in full view on the other side of the valley, just thirty miles distant. The romantic Callapooya river divides the town. Our denizens can boast of five church buildings, all occupied; and if the Southern Methodists can build one there will be six houses of worship. Not less than six preachers of the several denominations make their homes here; while we have all the bone, muscle and life of a town whose people are in clever worldly circumstances, intelligent, and are fond of going to church.

THE SIDEWALKS

of our towns are worthy of liberal imitation by every place in your State, or anywhere else where mud and water predominate during the wet half of the year. These walks are made of plank, nailed to a raised foundation of timber—porch-like—and are from three to six feet broad. With such protection the people, even the ladies and children, can venture out in their holiday attire, and can with all confidence bid defiance to the deepest, broadest, blackest and most treacherous mud-holes, at night as well as day.

HOUSE SERVANTS,

either black, yellow or white, outside the hotels, are hardly known in our land. So far I have not met with one such personage on my work. And yet the people are well-to-do in the world. Every family is at full liberty to do their own work—cooking, washing, etc. Think of that, dear friends of the sunny South. There are at least two reasons to account for this state of things, one of which is the very great scarcity of the article, and the other is that the people generally had rather do their own work, and thus be saved from the expense, the great trial and the ruinous waste incident to these appendages of the family circle. In mingling with this people, with this fact before me, I feel like saying with the psalmist: "Happy is that people that is in such a case." Yes, happy is that people who have not these fretting ulcers to contend with. Of course I write of servants thus as a class. There are exceptions, who are worth their weight in gold coin.

This is a white man's State emphatically. True, we have a sprinkle of Chinese about the towns, a few strolling Indians, scattered here and there, as the last leaves and small twigs of an otherwise dead tree. But negroes are very rare and seldom seen. I do not now remember to have seen more than two—a man and his wife. He (Uncle John) died last week—died in the faith, and doubtless rests to-day on the delightful shores of "bright Canaan."

EDUCATION

occupies a prominent position before the people here, so far as my information extends. The Methodist Episcopal Church South has a very flourishing male college at Corvallis. It promises to be a great lever for good to this whole people.

The public school system seems to run smoothly, and accomplish good work so far as educating the mind is involved; but the heart is not reached. And this is one of the great errors of education where it is done by the State, and the disastrous blunder of the public school system everywhere. There is no God, no Christ, no religion in it. I fear that our present aspect as a nation is due in a great measure to this loose way of preparing the children for time and eternity.

THE CLIMATE

in some respects is very similar to that of the middle and northern parts of your State. There is a very long rainy season, interspersed with some snow and ice. The cold weather generally is only moderate, seldom reaching severity—so say the old citizens. It is said that the summer is beautiful in the extreme. There are no thunder-storms, no heavy dews—none at all, say some—no extremely hot days; nights always cool and delightful for balmy sleep. The birds and flowers are said to be numerous, while the valleys and sides of the grand old mountains are covered over with delicious berries. Pleasure parties and berrying parties go out for a week or so at a time. Commodore Maury, in his Geography, says: "Its (Oregon's) climates resemble those of southern France, along the Atlantic, more than they do those of the New England States in the same latitude."

FRUITS AND GRAIN

are abundant. The apples are grown to perfection; also pears, cherries and plums of several varieties; but peaches do well only in certain localities. This is looked upon as one of the very best grain countries in the world. And just here I will note two egregious blunders in Commodore Maury's "Manual of Geography" with reference to our wheat, which are calculated to lead the public astray on the matter, and do considerable damage to the State. On the same page (71) he says: "It (Oregon) is a fine grain country; but its wheat will not bear long sea voyages, like the wheat of California." Now this is one of the two blunders, and it is just the antipodes of the truth. I am informed by responsible men that the Oregon wheat is so far superior to that of California that for a number of years some of the leading houses in San Francisco bought up Oregon's magnificent grain and shipped it as the production of California, and kept and sold their own inferior article on this side of the sea as Oregon wheat. "The cat was let out of the bag" in some way, and the Oregonians saw it and the dishes were changed for another course; and now they ship their grain direct to Europe from Portland and Astoria; and I am told that it commands the highest price in that distant market.

On the same page he says: Because their grain will not bear shipment to the distant markets of the world "the inhabitants have turned their attention to stock-raising and wool-growing." The people, I would reply, grow wheat as extensively as ever, because they can send their grain to advantageous marts of trade. At this time hundreds of thousands of bushels, in sacks, are being shipped, while quantities of grain are being sown. They use the latest and most improved machinery in their farm work.

While the crops never fail here, it is said that they do in California. The scarcity of winter rains will produce a drouth which will ruin it; or when the grain is almost ripe for the mower, sometimes a dry, hot wind will blow and destroy the crop in a single night. But I must hasten to the approaching finis.

MISCELLANEOUS.

King Alcohol, I judge, has but little sway here. The laws and the people are very rigid against it. I have not yet seen a person in a state of inebriation here.

The health of the State is, I think, as good as that of Tennessee, Kentucky, and of the healthier parts of Louisiana. Oregon is Democratic in her politics, and, as far as I can learn, a warm sympathizer with the downtrodden of your State and the South generally. Of course there are some among us who see not as we see, and indulge in opposite opinions and feelings. Many of our citizens are from the Western States.

What we most need in the way of internal improvements is our railroad completed from Roseburg to Sacramento city, the Willamette river cleaned out for low water navigation, and then a general system of draining. Our prairies, though far richer and more productive than those of the Opelousas country, are just as wet.

Our Conference here is small. Our church is very weak in numbers and financial means. Our preachers are more or less fettered by the lack of a full and liberal support. We have many enemies among the members of the Methodist Episcopal Church. However, there are some noble exceptions. Because of all these things I fear our growth will not be rapid, and it will not be accomplished without much labor, prayer and self-denial. I know not whether I will be fully supported or not. If I fail it will not be on account of our people failing to do their duty, for so far they are standing bravely up to me by their prayers and means.

Rev. T. B. White is abundant in labors, and, I hope, doing a great work. He and others are now bravely at it in Albany, making a grand and glorious charge upon the lines of sin. No particulars as yet. You will hear in due time. O how strange, lonely and lost a stranger feels in a strange land! How one does want and crave sympathy! God bless all our friends in our own dear Louisiana.

JAMES E. BRADLEY.

Bro. James Shanks' "Christian Experience."

He says (NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE, March 16:) "A sound and true Christian experience consists in two things, namely: 1. A knowledge of sins forgiven. 2. A knowledge of the time and place this work was done."

I will not stop to inquire whether "knowledge" can be very properly called a "work," but, noticing that his essay relates almost exclusively to the latter proposition, with only an incidental reference in one or two places to the former, I will express my belief that his teaching is hardly above theological criticism.

"All converted to God in the days of Jesus Christ and his apostles knew both the time and place of their conversion." This assertion is several times repeated, but without either proof or allusion to the possibility of proof. The period named is generally reckoned to comprise a hundred years. In it, in all likelihood, some millions of persons were converted. Of their knowledge of the "time and place" we know nothing. I am surprised at a statement so utterly wanting in historic accuracy, and with no attempt at proof.

Bro. Shanks tells us that a professing Christian who does not "recollect the time" "is a deceived man." I suppose he means remember. "Recollect" implies that it has not been continuously in the mind. But, even thus improved, the statement is both defective and dangerous.

My belief is that a recollection of time and place, in itself considered, is of little or no consequence in a "true Christian experience," and that to insist upon it as necessary or even important is exceedingly erroneous and dangerous.

Bro. Shanks forgets that the conversion itself is not a subject of sense or experience. It is the effects or results that flow from conversion that we feel or know of. I am aware the term conversion is ambiguous, I use it because Bro. Shanks does, and in the sense he does—that is, equivalent to pardon or regeneration, a merciful act of God. As we cannot see divine acts, we can know of them only by their effects and by verbal revelation. So what we know of conversion is what we feel—our own experience.

This sensible effect of conversion is exceedingly various in different persons. While the conversion itself is always the same, the sensible, personal effect is as various as human temperament, character, age, habitude and social status are various among men. They range from the zephyr to the tornado, from the dew-drop to the storm. In persons of strong, sanguine temperament, converted late in life, after years of flagrant sin, the suddenness and greatness of the transition would be so vivid as likely to cause him to remember rather than to recollect the time and place. This remembrance might or might not be of advantage to him in after-life. I think in many cases it proves a man's ruin. To rely upon it as a guarantee of safety, as many do, is fearfully dangerous. Much of the loose, slipshod, no-account Christianity among us is of this character. He remembers, or rather recollects, "the time and place," and that is about the sum of his religion.

I know of no present value to the Christian of a historic conversion—something away back yonder. Present value consists solely in present grace. Present health to the recovered invalid is far better to-day than the doctor's journal as to the "time and place" when he began to convalesce. The present possession of knowledge is more valuable than a historic recollection of the first juvenile lessons. Things merely remembered are gone from us, and are with the years beyond the flood. The present only is ours. What a Christian once was is one thing, and is of but little importance now; the great question relates to the present. I know of no promise, either in Scripture or reason, based upon a past experience.

Moreover, the constitutional principle presented by Bro. Shanks is sadly defective from this further consideration: All conversions ought to occur under circumstances where a recollection of the "time and place" would seldom if ever be practicable. Conversion ought always to occur very early in life. Taking the miserable family government around us as it is, it may not be practicable to secure conversion always in early childhood. But certainly conversion always ought to and sometimes does take place in the third, fourth or fifth year, if not earlier. The conversion was as genuine as the "powerful" one of forty or fifty years; but the man or woman in after-life would not be likely to recollect much about the "time and place." You might as well ask a man when he first began to love his mother.

Bro. Shanks proves too much. He proves that a man does not love his wife, because he cannot in every case recollect the exact time and place he first began to love her. He also comes squarely in contact with many of the most eminent examples of Christian holiness known to religious biography. His is a new religion, small in experience, supported solely by naked assertion, and utterly unknown to either the theology or the facts of Scripture. It is not the faith of my church. It never was the faith of any church. So far as I know, it was never taught by any respectable author except Bro. Shanks.

It is also fearfully dangerous. Make everybody believe that a recollection of the "time and place" is a condition of grace—that without that "he is a deceived man, and is not converted to God"—and you unsettle the faith of three-fourths of the best Christians in Christendom; you render children's conversion well-nigh impossible; you produce distrust and distraction, and fearful timidity and invoc of the flock everywhere; and you overturn the Scriptures. He "proves" that every one converted in the apostolic age remembered the time and place by citing three or four very dubious and inconclusive examples. By the same rule I prove that every person in Mississippi was murdered in the year 1874 by showing that two or three were!

Bro. Shanks dismisses from Christian fellowship all except a few strong-minded men of ardent temperament, bold self-assertion and lion-hearted faith. Whether they are generally the best and most profitable Christians or not I do not know. That they comprise the entire faith among us I will not believe. It is a new-fangled theology, unsupported by reason and unknown to revelation.

Obituaries.

DIED, in Will county, Mississippi, at the residence of her father and mother, James A. and Harriet I. Combs, Mrs. MARTHA E. MILLER. She was born October 6, 1818, and died November 14, 1874. For many months before her death she was a great sufferer. She joined the Methodist Episcopal Church South in the fall of 1871, under the ministry of Rev. A. McPhatter, but of her conversion we know not the time. But this we do know: that she was ready to go to that rest prepared for the people of God. When asked by her brother if she was willing to die, her reply was: "Oh, yes; and, brother, let us all meet in heaven. I do not fear death. Jesus died for me." She shouted aloud the praises of God, and committed to his keeping her three little children. Thus peacefully, triumphantly she breathed out her life on the bosom of her Savior.

A FRIEND.

MRS. ELIZABETH BRIGGS SPENCER died at the residence of her son, Dr. Thomas L. H. Maclin, near Marion, Union parish, Louisiana, January 18, 1875, in the eighty-fifth year of her life. She was born in Greenville county, Virginia, May 1, 1790, and was married December 10, 1810, to Benjamin Maclin, and to Thomas Spencer March 22, 1839. Her maiden name was Mason—one of that large family in her native State who for more than a hundred years have made the name honorable.

Under the ministry of Jesse Lee and John Early she was awakened, and by the latter brought into the fold of Christ nearly sixty years ago, while he traveled the Brunswick circuit, Virginia, and has ever since remained a faithful and devoted disciple of the Savior. She moved to Alabama many years since, and then settled in the bounds of the Memphis Conference, in Mississippi, and lastly to Louisiana, where she will rest till called to the first resurrection. Christianity with her was a principle of life, and during threescore years she kept and loved, as well as adorned, the doctrines of Christ as taught by the primitive heralds of Methodism. As life advanced she calmly awaited the end, and when the summons came she died as one falling into peaceful slumbers.

DIED, February 27, 1875, at his residence near Madison Station, Mississippi, JAMES O. STEVENS. The deceased was born in Hardy county, Virginia, May 17, 1832. In 1850 he came to Jackson, Mississippi, where he lived until after the close of the late war, when he removed to Madison county. During the time that he was resident in Jackson he prospered greatly in business, and soon became a man of large means.

He was married, in 1855, to Miss M. E. Lambuth, eldest daughter of Rev. J. R. Lambuth, formerly of the Mississippi Conference, and sister of Rev. J. W. Lambuth, our China missionary.

Bro. Stevens' spiritual birth dates from 1853, during which year he connected himself with the Baptist Church. Two years afterward he joined the Methodist Episcopal Church South, and remained a member thereof until his name was transferred to the records of the church above.

The closing years of our brother's life were years of deep affliction. Suddenly overwhelmed and almost dispirited by financial disasters consequent upon the havoc of war, he became about the same time the victim of that insidious destroyer of human life—consumption. For six long years did he grapple with the monster before the end came; yet during that protracted period his most intimate friends heard no words of complaint against that Providence whose dispensations are so inscrutable.

His death was of that peaceful character which revelation authorizes us to expect as the end of the upright. During the last few days of his earthly pilgrimage the felicities of a future state seemed to be the constant theme of his meditations. He often spoke of his departure, and always did so with the utmost composure and cheerfulness; and there were times when he seemed impatient that the hour of his release was delayed so long.

W. C. BLACK.

BRO. BARNEY, the eldest son of Quinea and Martha Lewis, was born in Robertson county, North Carolina, on the twenty-eighth of September, 1818; he emigrated with his parents to Pearl river, in Marion county, Mississippi, in 1820, where he was reared in the fear of the Lord, and in the way he should go. He was united in holy matrimony to Kezia Lamkin, eldest daughter of S. L. Lamkin, on the fifteenth of January, 1846. He moved to Scott county in December, 1856; thence to Brookhaven in 1868; thence to Crystal Springs in 1871, where he died of chronic diarrhea, December 30, 1874.

Barney, as he was familiarly called by nearly every one who was intimately acquainted with him, was converted and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, South under the ministry of Rev. George C. Light, late of the Mississippi Conference, in September, 1857, and served as class-leader for ten or twelve years. Barney was kind, benevolent, affable, generous, and beloved by nearly all who knew him. He was a kind father and a good husband. He met with many reverses during life, but he endured them all like a Christian. He died in great peace, only regretting the apparent helpless condition in which his large family, consisting mostly of girls and little ones, would be left. Bros. H. J. Harris, J. W. McNeil and H. P. Bowen, all of the Mississippi Conference, were with him frequently during his last days, and afforded him and his family much comfort and consolation by reading the Scriptures, singing and praying with them, for all of which the writer feels under lasting obligations to them.

Barney was my oldest brother, and I loved him dearly. May God bless the bereaved wife and children, and be indeed a father to the fatherless and judge of the widow.

HENRY TILMAN, son of Barney and Kezia Lewis, was born February 3, 1867, and died January 10, 1875. Tilly was a quiet, "say-nothing" child, passionately fond of singing; could learn a tune as quick as a man. He often said he would not live to be a man, but would add: "If I do I shall be a Methodist preacher." Father and child are now together in heaven.

H. P. LEWIS.

DIED, at the parsonage, Lower Peachtree circuit, Selma district, Alabama Conference, at half-past two o'clock P. M., on Thursday, November 12, 1874, Sister LOUISA C. HUNDLEY, in the twenty-ninth year of her age.

A more affecting scene was never presented to all who were privileged to witness it than did the death-bed of our loved and lamented sister. Her suffering was not as intense as that of many—her illness lasted only ten days—at least we conclude that it was not, from the fact that she never complained, but maintained to the last that patience and meekness so rarely exhibited by persons in such extremities.

On the twenty-ninth day of October she gave back to God a little infant boy which she was privileged to keep only a few days. For two or three days before it died it suffered a great deal, during which time she watched over it with that anxious care known only to a mother, and very soon after its death the disease that terminated her earthly career set in. The night before she died, and at the hour when her physicians entertained some hope that a change in favor of the patient would take place, Bro. Hundley told her that he feared their hopes were destroyed, and that, as he had promised her, he felt it his duty to inform her that she could last but a short time longer. At first she seemed to doubt their conclusion, and talked somewhat hopefully of the prospects; but soon she began to realize the truth, and, with a resignation to the Master's will never before witnessed by the writer, she began her preparations to leave her children, her husband and her friends, to all and each of whom she addressed herself as intelligently and calmly as if she were parting with them to take a journey of a month and return. As she pressed the dying kiss upon her little children she commended them to God, who, she said, would take care of them. She admonished every one present to serve God faithfully and meet her in heaven, and left a dying message for her father and mother, who reside in Mississippi, not to grieve for her, but to exult in the hope of their reunion beyond this vale of tears and sorrow. May the Spirit of God attend this message, and sanctify it to the ultimate salvation of that father, who, we are informed, has never made a profession of that religion which gave his sainted daughter an easy passage from time to eternity.

As God works by means, and while we regard Sister Hundley's death as a serious disaster to her family, and a great calamity to the church and the ministry, we feel thankful to him whose "ways are past finding out" for that manifestation of the "power of God unto salvation," so clearly demonstrated by Sister Hundley in the very throes of death, and beseech him to sanctify the bereavement to the good of many souls, and make us truly thankful for the inestimable privilege of ministering to the wants of such while upon beds of languishing, there to witness, as we did in Sister Hundley's case, that

"Jesus can make a dying bed Feel soft as downy pillows are."

A FRIEND.

THERE is a good story of a certain Boston doctor of divinity, whose name they spell with a "P." A man of the same name died, and a zealous newspaper fellow, seeing the death in the paper, and thinking only of Dr. P., wrote a most enthusiastic obituary. A wag met Dr. P. the next day. "What! you are not dead?" he said. "Well, then, you ought to be. No man can live up to that obituary."

LIFE'S COST.

BY JANE ELLICE HOCKINS.

I could not at the first be born
But by another's bitter, wailing pain;
Another's loss must be my sweetest gain;
And Love, only to wile that I might be,
Must wet her couch forlorn
With tears of blood and sweat of agony.

Since then I cannot live a week
But some fair thing must leave the daisied dells,
The joy of pastures, bubbling springs and wells,
And grassy murmurs of its peaceful days,
To bleed in pain, and reek,
And die, for me to tread life's pleasant ways.

I cannot sure be warmed or lit
But men must crouch and toil in fortunes caves,
Bowed on themselves, while day and night in waves
Of blackness wash away their soulless lives!
Or, blasted and sore hit,
Dark life to darker death the miner drives.

Naked, I cannot clothed be
But worms must patient weave their sathe shroud;
The sheep must shiver to the April cloud,
Yielding his one white coat to keep me warm;
In shop and factory
For me must weary, toiling millions swarm.

With gems I deck not brow or hand
But through the roaring dark of cruel seas
Some wreach with shivering breath and trembling knees
Goes toadlong, while the sea-sharks dodge his quest;
Then at my door he stands,
Naked, with bleeding ears and heaving chest.

I fall not on my knees and pray
But God must come from heaven to fetch that sigh,
And pierced hands must take it back on high;
And through his broken heart and cloven side
Love makes an open way
For me, who could not live but that he died.

O awful, sweetest Life of mine,
That God and man both serve in blood and tears!
O prayers I breathe not but through other prayers!
O breath of life compact of others' sighs!
With like dread gift divine,
Ah, whither go?—what wordlily devise?

If on myself I dare to spend
This dreadful thing, in pleasure lapped and reared,
What am I but a hideous idol smeared
With human blood, that with its carrion smile
Alike to foe and friend
Maddens the wretch who perishes the while?

I will away and find my God,
And what I dare not keep ask him to take,
And, taking, love's sweet sacrifice to make;
Then, like a wave, the sorrow and the pain
High Heaven with glory flood—
For them, for me, for all, a splendid gain.

A Christian Parent to His Child's Sabbath School Teacher.

BY REV. JOHN HALL, D. D.

MY DEAR FRIEND: I have learned that my child is to be a pupil under your care in the Sunday school, and I hope it will not be disagreeable to you to receive a frank communication from me on a subject which you can well believe is very near my heart. And, first of all, I thank you for engaging in this work, and for becoming, for Christ's sake, a helper to me. I am aware that my child has no claim on your time and patience, except such as we had on Jesus Christ, who loved us for his grace, and pitied us in our need. I pray God that you may help, comfort and encourage in your labor of love, and that the Lord may give you the joy of seeing your scholars converted to God, and safe in the fold of the Good Shepherd! And I beg to assure you that I shall feel bound to give all the co-operation possible, by overseeing the lessons learned at home, by encouraging regularity, punctuality and respect for the school and for you, and by the constant prayer for the divine blessing on the seed you sow. It is not necessary to say that, whenever your other engagements will permit you to call at my home, you shall receive a most cordial welcome.

Will you allow me to tell you the ideas and the hopes with which my child is sent to school? The statement of the same to you may tend to secure our working together, and to prevent either undoing in any way the work of the other. Sabbath schools I regard, like sermons and other means of grace, as intended of God for the salvation of men. He loves us, pities us and would have us come to the knowledge of the truth.

The truth is the usual means by which men are enlightened. The Holy Spirit uses it for their awakening, conversion and sanctification. By the truth I mean the truth of God, of God's Bible—the truth of which the precious Savior is the substance. Any impression made otherwise than by the Holy Ghost through the truth we must doubt. Any change produced otherwise than by the truth you and I agree in regarding as short of conversion. This saving truth, then, my dear fellow-laborer, urge constantly on my child. Get your own mind filled with it every week, and pour it out in your class. Lift up the blessed Savior from Old Testament history, and psalm and prophecy, from type and symbol, from New Testament gospel and epistle. There is, as you know, a road from every part of the Scriptures to Calvary. Whatever reveals our weakness, sin, folly and darkness suggests the Redeemer, with his sufficient grace, cleansing blood, heavenly wisdom and glorious light. O my friend and helper in this delicate work, tell my child this truth, and make our one, only, exalted Savior the beginning and ending of your instruction!

Need I remind you—what your own experience and observation has shown—that the mind on which you work, over and above the natural disinclination to the truth, is wayward, forgetful and feeble. It is a child's mind. So you will, I am sure, study simplicity, doing with the truth as the mothers do with the bread for the babes—crumbling and softening it for their mouths. I had almost said, also, sweetening it; but this analogy fails, for who can add sweetness to the glad tidings of great joy! But we can, as you have learned no doubt, put the truth in such a way that it will be fitted to attract and hold the attention, and become a pleasant object before the child's mind, both in the memory of the past and in the expectation of future lessons. I know, dear friend, how often this must needs tax your patience and your ingenuity; but then it is for a soul you labor. Nay, I will look higher. You attempt it for the Redeemer's sake. "He is worthy for whom you should do this."

You may have noticed that even God's truth may be told in a spirit that does not suit it, that does not belong to it, as if medicine were given in a powder or a fluid that counteracted its healing tendency. A hard, unfeeling manner, even a sharp and bitter tone in the voice, may give a wrong idea of the gospel. The "truth in love" is God's message of life to young and old.

I know my own heart too well, dear friend, to suppose you, or any other Christian, above the reach of temptation; and I shall take pains to warn my child against cherishing unreasonable expectations, as if a Sabbath school teacher could not be hurt by rudeness, or grieved by evil, or vexed by deliberate wrong-doing. Yet I need hardly remind you that we have both to guard against any such display of temper or vexation, or even annoyance, as would give the natural heart a specious plea for thinking meanly of our religion or our Master. Long before your pupils have read through the Bible they will have formed their opinion of you. May God give you the grace to be a "living epistle of Christ!" so that they may say in after days, if nothing else, at least this: "I know true religion to be a real thing, for I saw it in my Sabbath school teacher."

It is a small matter (and yet in the frankness of this letter I will not pass it by,) but it has often produced serious results, that levity of manner, often, no doubt, quite innocent, or showiness of dress, or evident love of display, has been noticed by quick young eyes, and employed by satan to turn off the arrows of conviction from their hearts. "Teacher is proud or dressy, or likes to be admired, or wants to please" anybody but the Lord; such thoughts, oftener put into words—and sharp, clear words too—than is imagined by adults, will greatly mar the best teaching. May I not, without saying more about this, write down the words of the wise man, when he likens to the disgusting effect of dead flies in a pot of ointment that of "a little folly."—even a little—in "him that is in reputation for wisdom and honor."

Can we have any other true qualification for our work than that which was given to the great Teacher "without measure." Read it in Isaiah xi, 2, 3:

"And the Spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him, the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and might, the spirit of knowledge and the fear of the Lord; and shall make him of quick understanding in the fear of the Lord; and he shall not judge after the sight of his eyes, neither reprove after the hearing of his ears."

And how much need we have to imitate his tenderness, gentleness and patience, and his adaptation to the mental condition of the learners, as in John xvi, 12: "I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now."

My deep earnestness in this matter will, I hope, justify to your judgment my long letter; and yet I have not said all I wish to say, as, for example, regarding your sustaining my authority at home, as I shall seek to uphold yours in the school; or regarding the need to inspire my child with a love for the Sabbath, and a hearty respect for the means of grace we enjoy in common, and the pastor who ministers to us in holy things. Nor have I entered upon a theme in itself all-important—the need, common to you and me, of constant regard to the Lord, constant waiting on him for light and strength, and constant dependence on his grace to give effect to our poor labor. May you, dear fellow-laborer, thus watch and pray, and may it be given to us to rejoice together at last, I in a child and you in a scholar saved and brought home to eternal glory! And oh, shall we not then say, with unutterable joy: "Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but to thy name be the praise!" May God bless you, and establish the work of your hands! Amen.—The Normal Class.

Father Boehm's Memories of a Hundred Years.

WRITTEN FROM HIS LIPS BY THE REV. JOHN ATKINSON.

BISHOP GEORGE.

Among the most powerful preachers I have known in my long life was Bishop George. He was not, I think, the equal of McKendree or Roberts in breadth and strength of intellect, but he surpassed them in emotional power and in the adaptation of his voice and manner to move an audience. He was not regarded as the equal of his colleagues as a presiding officer. He did not possess the faculty of holding a deliberative body well under control, and by his abruptness and haste in the chair of Conference he frequently provoked criticism. Emory was vastly his superior in his methods of presiding and governing.

As a preacher, however, Bishop George was remarkable. Physically he was well endowed. He was of good stature, of well-rounded proportions, a pleasing countenance, and an excellent voice, suited to be the vehicle of his melting emotions. His mind clearly apprehended the doctrines of the gospel, and with much vividness and earnestness he presented them to the minds of his hearers. The effect commonly was at once visible in the deep interest and tears of his congregations. He swayed a wide and blessed influence as a preacher of the gospel.

All ministers should be revivalists, but some are much better adapted to inaugurate and carry forward religious movements than others. Temperament, voice and other qualities largely account for the difference in ministers in this respect. I think, from my knowledge of the Methodist ministry for more than three-quarters of a century, that the strongest and best-furnished minds of the church have been most successful in moving the people and in gathering converts. Sometimes, however, a keen and vigorous mind may be allied with a cold or sluggish temperament, an unprepossessing person, and a disagreeable voice. Such drawbacks will frequently account for the lack of success of some good and earnest men, whose mental capacity is greater than that of many who surpass them in winning souls.

Bishop George was a fine type of a revival preacher. His quick sensibilities, tenderness of feeling, and his deep spiritual ardor, together with his attractions of voice and manner, gave him great persuasive powers. He knew how to reach men's hearts by the shortest route. And when once he got hold upon the heart he did not let go, but held on with determination to subdue. It has been justly said of him that no man ever succeeded more uniformly to move sinners, to subdue his congregation to tears, and sometimes even to trembling and loud cries. His was a burning ambition to save.

In 1786, while yet rather a young preacher, he was appointed presiding elder of a district which included the city of Charleston, South Carolina. He beheld a religious dearth prevailing on the district, and he at once addressed himself to the work of reformation. He called upon preachers and people with fervent exhortations to unite in seeking the revival of the work of God. He succeeded in rallying the church, and as the result he saw in a few months the appointments aglow with revival fire and two thousand souls added to the church within his district.

I was first associated with Mr. George at the General Conference in Baltimore in 1808. It was not until eight years afterward that he was elected Bishop. During my travels with Bishop Asbury in 1808-13 I occasionally met Mr. George. During that period he was on circuits and filled the office of presiding elder on the Potomac district. His commanding power and success as a preacher no doubt elevated him to the episcopacy.

Bishop George was abundant in labors. He entered the ministry in 1789, when the exposures and hardships of an itinerant life were great. He traveled through the swamps of the South, breathing their malaria and suffering much from attacks of fever, with health so broken at times that he was compelled to desist from traveling and engage in teaching for support. At one time he was presiding elder of the Georgia district, in the South Carolina Conference, which was an immense field. How wonderful has been the growth of Methodism in that region.

As Bishop he was continually going about doing good. He traveled throughout the United States and Canada, preaching and superintending the work.

As Bishop George lived, suffered and toiled for God and for souls, there could not have been any doubt in regard to his safety in dying, had he not been permitted to give any testimony at the last. It pleased God, however, to give him a peculiarly rapturous experience when heart and flesh were failing, and his final words were in harmony with his spirit and character throughout his ministry. He clasped his hands and said: "Shout glory to God! the best of all is, God is with us." On being asked if he had any business to settle he replied: "Nothing of importance. I am going to glory. I have been many years trying to lead others to glory, and now thither I am going. For me to live is Christ, but to die is gain. Jesus is precious." His death occurred in 1828.—Methodist.

THE Evening Journal gives the following synopsis of the new marriage law in Germany, a measure which has, or will completely revolutionize the customs of the people in the matter:

The new marriage laws recently passed by the German Parliament are in striking contrast to the narrow, restrictive enactments till lately in force in some German States. It is but a few years ago that the difficulties thrown in the way of marriage among the Bavarians, for example, were so great that they were offered and often accepted as a sufficient excuse for the fact that among the poorer classes a large proportion of the births were out of wedlock. Munich even rivaled Paris, where a third of the births are illegitimate. And the laws were different, of course, in every German State. But aside from its removal of oppressive restrictions, and from the benefits of uniformity, the new law deserves especial notice as a long step in that separation of Church from State of which the open contest with Rome forms a part. All jurisdiction of marriage and divorce is now taken away from the clergy. So far as legality goes, priests, monks and nuns may marry if they please. People may be married before a civil registrar, without the aid of a minister of any denomination; and parents are no longer required to have their children baptized. But a woman must have the consent of her father if she marries before twenty-four, and a man twenty-five, the courts having a right to grant a dispensation in case of a refusal. Some of the provisions contain suggestions worthy the attention of our legislative Solons. A person divorced for adultery, for instance, cannot marry his or her paramour. Another section is in the interest of good taste, if nothing more, for it forbids a widow remarrying for ten months after the death of her husband. Popular feeling in regard to the secularization of marriage and baptism is clear from the fact that under a similar law in Prussia only twenty-five per cent. of the marriages in Berlin have been celebrated in churches, and only thirty per cent. of the children born have been baptized.

A GERMAN SUNDAY SCHOOL.—The Sunday School Times gives the following picture of a Sunday school room in Germany: "A poor miner showed me his school-room. I asked where his seats were. He pointed to the ceiling, where a number of forms were hanging to two rafters, being lowered down for each Sunday session, and hoisted up to make room for the week's work. His scholars listen anxiously to this man, who works in the coal mines under ground, and also in the gold mines of the word of God. He pays ten thalers rent a year, and lays by enough of his hard-earned wages to give a Bible to each scholar who leaves his school when grown up. He also composed a hymn-book, of which he has sent me a copy."

What Is Believing?

BY HORATIUS BONAR, D. D.

"He that believeth is instilled from all things," we repeated, slowly and fully, in the ears of an inquirer.

"Are not these the words of God?"

"Yes, but I am none the better for them."

"How is that?"

"I don't know."

"Are the words true words?"

"Yes."

"Did God mean just what he said when using them?"

"Yes, certainly."

"Are we to take the words in their simple and ordinary sense?"

"Of course we are."

"Are you doing so?"

"I hope I am."

"Let us see; for, if you are, I don't understand why you should still remain burdened and troubled."

"But what am I to do?"

"Do? Do the words mention doing?"

"No; they speak of believing."

"Anything else?"

"No; just believing."

"If God had meant anything more, would he not have said it? Would he not have used another word to prevent mistakes? Did he not use the most exact and suitable word?"

"Undoubtedly. But how does that bear upon my case?"

"We shall see. But keep in mind that God used the word believeth just because he meant believeth, and did not wish you to be mystified. He used two words in this passage (Acts xiii, 39,) 'believe' and 'justify,' and he used them both in their usual sense; for if 'believe' does not mean 'believe,' then 'justify' does not mean 'justify.'"

"Am I, then, to take faith and believing just in their usual meaning, as when they are applied to the things of man?"

"Of course; for God takes our common words, and applies them to the things of God, just that we may know his meaning thoroughly. We think that we must add something to them when we use our common words in connection with religious things; whereas God wishes us just to understand them always in their usual sense."

"Does believing, then, just mean believing?"

"It does; and if you make it as meaning anything else you corrupt the words of God, and prevent your getting the benefit of his gracious words."

"Is my believing what a friend writes to me the same as my believing what God writes to me?"

"It is. And now let me apply this to the passage referred to a little while ago. You admit that God says: 'He that believeth is justified from all things.'"

"Yes; it is written so."

"But is it true?"

"It must be so."

"Why?"

"Because God has said it."

"Then you believe the statement on the authority of God himself?"

"I do."

"Well, he says: 'He that believeth is justified,' and you say, 'I believe, but I am not justified.' Is that the case?"

"Not exactly. What I say is: 'I believe, but I am not sure whether I am justified.'"

"But in so far as God's statement here is concerned, that comes to the same thing; for he has said that he that believeth is justified. So that you must either say, 'I don't believe, and therefore I am not justified,' or, 'I believe, and therefore I am justified.'"

"Yes; I see that is the alternative."

"Well, which are you to say? Are you to consent to what God says, and come to the conclusion at once, 'I believe, and therefore I am justified,' or to contradict God, and say, 'I believe, but I am not justified,' or, 'I believe, but I don't know whether I am justified or not?'"

"I cannot but consent to what God says. I dare not contradict him. I dare not separate what he has joined together. It is God that says that 'he that believeth is justified;' who am I that I should say, 'I believe, but I am not justified?'"

"Is not this, then, the loosing of your bonds?"

"It is. On God's authority I am assured that 'he who believeth is justified.' I believe, and so I must come to the sure conclusion that I am justified."

"Do not, then, separate what God has joined together—believing and being justified. Remember that the believing man is the justified man."

"Have feelings, then, nothing to do with my justification?"

"Certainly not; else God would have said: 'Being justified by feeling, we have peace with God.'"

"Has regeneration nothing to do with my justification?"

"Not, certainly, in the sense of procuring it; else it would have been said: 'Being justified by regeneration, we have peace with God.'"

"I see it. In believing I am justified; and God uses the word believing with the common meaning which I as a man attach to it every day in common things."

"Yes; such is the simplicity of God. Such is the simplicity of all his words, especially of those words on which our salvation hangs."

I HAVE no hesitation in attributing a very large proportion of some of the most painful and dangerous maladies which come under my notice, as well as those which every medical man has to treat, to the ordinary and daily use of fermented drink taken in the quantity which is conventionally deemed moderate.—Sir Henry Thompson.

Religious Intelligence.

A CATHOLIC association has been formed in Paris, the members of which bind themselves not to buy, sell, work, nor cause work to be done by others on Sunday.

THE Reformed Episcopal Church grows slowly. A fourth church has been organized in Chicago, and a third in Philadelphia. A provisional organization has been effected of a church in Baltimore.

THE Pope has issued another encyclical. It denounces Germany and seeks to comfort the ousted bishops in that country. It also excommunicates members of the clergy who accept benefices from the State.

AN ILLUSTRIOUS CONVERT.—The Russian Bishop of Irkutsk, in eastern Siberia, has converted to Christianity a Buddhist Llama priest, who is inferior in rank and importance only to the Grand Llama himself.

THE Cambridge University Union has by a large majority declared that, by his recent pamphlet on the Vatican decrees, Mr. Gladstone has strengthened the political position of Great Britain and the cause of civil and national independence, and deserves the thanks of the country.

THE Rev. Dr. Tarbell, of Lynn, Massachusetts, has been appointed medical missionary to Kiu Kiang, China. We hear also of the appointment of the Rev. Thomas McClintock, of Baltimore, to Buenos Ayres, South America, and of a Mr. Lounsbury, formerly of Bethel, Connecticut, to Bulgaria.

PARK H. CASSADY, a Baptist layman of Philadelphia, recently deceased, left to his widow the income of the bulk of his property, all of the property to revert at her decease to the Baptist Publication Society. It is believed that the society will ultimately receive $50,000 to $75,000 from the estate.

THE Wesleyan Missionary Society has met with a severe loss in the death of Rev. Luke Wiseman, one of the general secretaries of the association. Dr. Wiseman was an able administrator, and his reports on mission work were always marked with a calm and clear judgment. He died at Islington, England, February 10, in the fifty-fifth year of his age.

THE Associate Reformed Presbyterian Church of the South have just entered upon the work of foreign missions. On January 27 a missionary meeting was held in Due West, South Carolina, the ecclesiastical capital of the denomination, to bid farewell to its first foreign missionary, Miss M. E. Galloway, who goes to Egypt.

AN American traveler who attended divine service on Sunday, February 7, in the Church of San Francisco, in the City of Mexico, which is held now by one of the congregations of the Protestant "Church of Jesus," reports the building as crowded to its utmost capacity with dark-hued Mexicans, who joined earnestly in the worship and listened intently to the preaching.

THE English Liberation Society have begun the year's operations in favor of disestablishment by inviting the members of Parliament to a soiree. This is to be followed by a special course of lectures to be delivered on the first four Mondays in March, the lecturers being the Rev. J. B. Heard, the Rev. Marmaduke Miller, Mr. Thorold Rogers, of Oxford, and the Rev. J. G. Rogers.

THE minutes of the Presbyterian meeting held in Edinburg last November on the proposed federal union of Presbyterian churches have been published, but we have not seen them. A meeting on the subject has been called in London, July 21, to which delegates have been invited from all Presbyterian churches in Great Britain, America, the Continent, the British colonies, "or elsewhere."

THE POPE AND NEWSPAPERS.—The Pope understands the value of having newspapers devoted to his interest, for, according to a statement made by an Irish Roman Catholic journal, he has issued orders to the apostolic treasury to spend £7,200 more this year than was expended last "on the establishment and extension of Catholic newspapers." How much money was devoted to this object last year is not mentioned.

THE Deutscher Merkur states that on Tuesday, December 15, the Chapter of Utrecht met in that city for the choice of a successor to Archbishop Laos, since whose decease in June, 1873, the see has been vacant. The choice fell upon the Rev. John Heykamp, parish priest of Schiedam, nephew of the late Bishop of Deventer. The bishop elect is a native of Utrecht, where he was born on the eighteenth of June, 1824, and was ordained to the priesthood in 1849 by Archbishop Van Santen. At the time that the Merkur published this news the bishop elect had not announced his acceptance of the office to which he had been chosen.

THE Advocate says that the Methodist mission work in Scandinavia dates from 1851, and is located in three distinct missions, in Denmark, Sweden and in Norway. The work in Denmark has been only moderately successful, and yet it has not been a failure. There are now about two hundred church members, and the work, after some mishaps, seems to have taken a new start. In Sweden the work has been truly wonderful. We have more than forty local societies in the chief cities and smaller towns, with an aggregate membership of nearly four thousand, an increase of nearly eight hundred during the year. The most remarkable revivals have prevailed in the missions in both Sweden and Norway. In the latter country the work is newer, but scarcely less promising of success. Its total membership is nearly two thousand.

"YELLOWS" AND "BLUES."—The Independence Belge says: "In Venezuela, in 1872, the 'Yellows'—that is to say, the Liberals and the partisans of reform—were in the majority. Up to this time the 'Blues' have not been able to regain the power, despite the differences which have broken out between the president, Guzman Blanco and Urbaneja. The protection given the 'Blues' by the Archbishop of Caracas has only irritated the Liberal party against the papacy, the pastoral letters, etc., exciting to insurrection, bringing it into discredit with those who would preserve the peace. The Bishop of Guayana, Mgr. Arroyo, understands this, and seems disposed to help the Liberal cause. Has the brief issued against it by Pius the Ninth made a change in his attitude? So far there is no reason to think so. It seems possible, then, that after a time the reform of the Catholic Church may triumph in Caracas and throughout Venezuela."

THE Catholic Standard gives some report of the Catholic mission work among the colored people of the South. In Baltimore the results of the mission are very encouraging. The congregation of St. Francis Xavier's number three thousand. The mission in Louisville, Kentucky, is very successful, and missions are contemplated at Augusta, Georgia, and other places. The Standard anticipates success from the contrast of Catholicism with Protestantism, which "is emphatically a religion of 'castes' and factions. It knows nothing of 'equality in the worship of God.' It has one place for the rich and another far the poor in its religion. The poor are tolerated only, if that, in its meeting-houses; and the poor know it, feel it, and act accordingly."

REV. MR. HUTCHINSON, writing to the Presbyterian Record from Mexico city, reports continual accessions to the mission church, which has now one hundred and twenty-three members. He recently organized a church at Vera Cruz, into which eighty-two were received at the outset, on profession. Engaged in a similar work at Acapulco, where a Protestant congregation has just been organized, Mr. Hutchinson, as a telegraphic dispatch informs us, was attacked by a mob and obliged to take refuge on a United States man-of-war in the harbor. The successes of the Protestant missions in Mexico have greatly exasperated the Romanists, and were not the government friendly to religious liberty the priests would not tolerate the presence of evangelical missionaries.

THE religious conflict in Switzerland seems to be assuming the aspect of a regular battle and siege. Recently the cantonal government of Geneva was obliged to call out the militia to enforce the law against the Ultramontanes of the parish of Compesieres. They had driven from the door of the parish church, with threats, a party of the Liberal Catholics who had come there to baptize the child of a M. Maurice, belonging by birth in the place, but a member of the Liberal church body, to the city. Police interference had proved useless, and an appeal having been made to the Council of State, it had been decided by that body that the time had arrived for using the armed power. Four hundred and sixty men, infantry, cavalry and gensdarmes, were called out, and marched upon the parish and church with due military precautions. The church was strongly barricaded. A disused side door which had been bricked up was discovered, and the government forces, using this, surprised the Ultramontanes and captured their position by a flank movement. The baptismal ceremony was then performed, after which the troops retired, the mob singing the Marseillaise at their backs.

MEXICO has one great advantage over the papal lands of the Old World. It has never until now had the opportunity of Bible knowledge. The gospel, therefore, comes to this country as a new message, not as a neglected one. The bitter persecutions which the mobs, urged on by ignorant priests, have inaugurated against Protestant preaching in various places show how earnest the new religious movement has become. The missionary enterprise, baptized with blood, can scarcely fail to produce larger results in the country of Mexico than in any other Romish land. The first onset of superstition against Bible faith was made, as our readers know, upon the mission of the American Board at Ahualulco, last winter, when the devoted Stephens became the proto-martyr of Christ in Mexico. The Presbyterians have been the next to feel the edge of the conflict. These missions in Mexico are making rapid progress around several well-chosen centers. From Mexico city a number of towns have been evangelized. A vigorous church has been planted at Vera Cruz; a robber-nest, Mitchic by name, has earnestly received the gospel; a congregation at Tlzapon has grown strong under persecution; and a favorable opening has been made at Tuapico. Zacatecas forms another center from which six or seven churches have been or are about to be formed in as many places. Full reports have now been received in regard to the nonsuance of Protestant worshipers at Acapulco, on the evening of January 26, 1875. A Bible, in the hands of one of the citizens, had gradually produced such an interest that Rev. Mr. Hutchinson was summoned from Mexico city to form a church. He arrived at Acapulco at the close of last year. After nearly a month of daily preaching, a congregation of fifty-three communicants was organized, January 21, and the communion celebrated. Meanwhile the city priest had not been idle. Repeated denunciations of the new sect had aroused the neighboring Indians. On the evening of January 26 an assault was made upon the Protestant congregation. Mr. Hutchinson had been detained from the meeting by illness. Senor Dias, who occupied his place, was stabbed by an Indian. A horrible scene ensued in the church. The Protestants defended themselves as best they could. Eight of them were killed outright and one of their assailants. Mr. Hutchinson was conveyed to a small American vessel in the harbor and thence made his escape to San Francisco. The federal authorities, who had interfered as promptly as possible to quell the riot, were unable, on account of the smallness of the garrison, to hold the murderous priest.—Independent.

REV. JOHN MATHEWS.
REV. LINUS PARKER, D. D.

CHANGE OF RATES.

In conformity with an agreement between the several papers published in the interest of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, the subscription price of the ADVOCATE, including postage, will hereafter be as follows, viz:

One year	$2 50
Six months	1 50
Three months	80

THE SUBSCRIPTION PRICE of the ADVOCATE is One Dollar and a Quarter per year to ministers of the gospel, and the same to the widows of deceased itinerant preachers. Where bills have been sent charging them more than that amount it was owing to the fact that they were not known as such to the book-keeper, and if they will inform us the accounts will be corrected. Should they have already paid we will credit the amount overpaid on subscription, or dispose of it as they may order.

LOOK OUT FOR ACKNOWLEDGMENTS.—Subscribers and other persons writing to us should look in the letter list for the acknowledgment of their letters. The letters which reach us on or before Saturday of each week are acknowledged in the issue of the following Thursday.

RATES.

The New Orleans Christian Advocate will be furnished to subscribers hereafter at the following rates, including postage:

One Year	$2 50
Six Months	1 50
Three Months	80

$1.25 A YEAR

to all Ministers of the Gospel, traveling or local; and widows of deceased traveling preachers.

FREE ONE YEAR

to any person forwarding to us four new yearly subscribers, with TEN DOLLARS.

The Sabbath.

"Line upon line, precept upon precept, here a little and there a little," is the patient utterance of the prophet. All the doctrines and duties require this persistent exhibition and enforcement. The same story must be told over and over, and the same great truths must be exhibited continuously. Human nature is forgetful—young people are growing up and must be taught what is already familiar to those more advanced in years. The moral sensibilities lose their tenderness, and the conscience becomes deadened or perverted in the presence of prevailing ungodliness. The Sabbath is especially liable to fall into neglect at a time when nearly all the foundations are shaken, and when a slack morality obtains in reference to leading moral obligations.

For religious people it should suffice merely to call their attention to the teachings of the Bible, and to warn them against the effects of evil example and bad associations. A grave responsibility rests upon Christian men. If they give way upon the question of keeping the day, the world will be without the testimony they are called to deliver, and all restraints will be weakened. Generally they are not as careful and as strict as they should be. The tendency, under the pressure of social customs and habits which surround them, is to yield somewhat, and to harmonize with the opinions and practices which obtain in the community.

There are few better tests of Christian character than the observance of the Sabbath. The ordering of domestic affairs, the arrangements of business, the guarding of the day from desecrating recreations and social engagements, and the quiet and holy atmosphere of a Sabbath in the home, are among the most significant indications of a true and firm devotion to the service of God. He who can withstand the world in this respect is likely to be found faithful in every duty. The fact that the institution is largely of a positive character, and in this to be distinguished from those purely moral precepts, such as truth, justice and temperance, only heightens the import of observing it. There are reasons enough for the sanctification of the Sabbath in the temporal and spiritual well-being of man, but the paramount consideration with the Christian is that God has commanded him to keep it holy. It becomes for this cause a more thorough and delicate test of character and of religious fidelity than any other commandment of the Decalogue. The heathen may have the moral law written in his heart, and he may have some conscience concerning honesty and equity, but he can have no conscience about the Sabbath, because its appointment is of a positive character, and only to be ascertained through the written word of God. The Sabbath is the indication of Christian and Bible obligation and conscience as distinguished from the morals of paganism and general unbelief.

There is danger of weakening our sense of Sabbath obligation by dwelling too exclusively upon the temporal benefits of the institution. From the overstraining of this point countenance may be given to the notion that the day may be devoted in a considerable degree to recreations and amusements; for these, it may be argued, are needful in connection with rest from labor. The Sabbath, however, is a religious day, and its supreme end is the religious welfare of men. Rest from labor, needful as it is to the body and mind, is a merciful incident rather than the main purpose. If it were chiefly for rest and recreation it would not have been sanctified, hallowed, and the command to keep it holy would have been out of place. "The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath," but for man in respect to his higher nature, and for his spiritual and eternal welfare. Whatever interferes with this end is necessarily prohibited. Time and opportunity are needed for religious duties and privileges, and these are secured by a day divinely appointed and set apart for devotional uses. God never made the Sabbath for base ball, picnics, visiting and social feastings, and reunions and domestic festivities. Its religious end is utterly destroyed by devoting it to amusements and society as much as if it were given up to the ordinary pursuits of business.

It would be better for all if the railroads, telegraphs, malls, post-offices, markets, family groceries, should all come to a halt on Sunday. It would be a boon to the souls and the bodies of all the people if the rest and quiet of the Sabbath could be secured alike to all classes. To attain this object we know of no measures of legislation or other expedients likely to affect public opinion which promise any speedy results. The thing that Christians can do is to be more careful themselves, and to guard against falling into a state of indifference and negligence on the subject. Improvement in the observance of the Sabbath must come from the teachings of the Bible, from the enforcement of the obligation by the ministry, and from the personal example and testimony of those who profess to love and obey the divine commandments. As the gospel makes its way, and in proportion as society is brought under its renovating power, will the Sabbath be lifted out of the dust, and honored and reverenced as a day of religious enjoyment and cheerful praise. We look hopefully in no other direction. Our religious people must be more exemplary in this duty, their homes must be blessed with a Sabbath, their children must be taught and governed with decided regard to the command, and the nature and obligations of the day must have a more prominent place in the teachings of our Sunday schools and in the preaching of our pulpits.

A stricter observance of the Sabbath would help the cause of family religion vastly, and it would have a wonderful influence upon the spirituality of the church. As Sabbath-breaking is connected with almost every form of dissipation, vice and crime, so its reverent recognition is associated with the greatest moral and spiritual blessings. The Sabbath is the great conservator and bulwark of sound morals and of public virtue. The most vital interests of society, the family and the State are promoted by it. Lax views and lax practices in relation to it open the flood-gates of all irreligion and of all unbelief.

Jerome.

This renowned father, scholar and translator was born in Stridon, a town in Dalmatia, according to the best authorities, about A. D. 345. Like most eminent and useful ministers, he was blest with pious parents, and to this must be added excellent educational advantages, this father superintending his primary education; but his linguistic and rhetorical and philosophical studies were pursued under the care of Ælius Donatus, at Rome. While he was a resident of Rome he was admitted to the rite of baptism, and decided to devote his life in rigid abstinence to the service of Christ. About A. D. 370 he is found busily engaged in the translation of Hilarius on the Psalms, and composing his first theological essays. In A. D. 373 he set out on a journey to the East, accompanied by some pious friends, and settled for a time at Antioch. While here he was seized with a violent fever, and during its paroxysms imagined he was arraigned before the bar of judgment, and severely reprimanded for his great devotion to Latin and heathen authors. The impression upon him was so strong that he resolved to abandon such studies; but, happily for himself and for others, in cooler and calmer moments he reversed this hasty decision. But there was a marked increase in his religious fervor, which continued to the end of his life. Devotion became his ruling passion. At this juncture he spent some three or four years in the desert in devotional exercises and in the study of the Hebrew language. In 379 he was ordained a presbyter by the Bishop of Antioch, but did not take charge of a congregation, preferring the itinerant life of a monk and a student. About 380 he visited Constantinople, and, though forty-five years of age, was not ashamed to set at the feet of Gregory Nazianzen, the celebrated anti-Arian preacher, and learn the arguments for the defense of the orthodox faith. While at Constantinople he renewed and prosecuted with success the study of the Greek language. At this time he occupied himself with the translation of several important works, especially from the writings of Eusebius and Origen. About 382 he returned to Rome and became the secretary and intimate friend of Damasus, the pontiff of Rome.

It is understood that Damasus encouraged Jerome to undertake the translation of the Scriptures from the original Hebrew and Greek into the Latin. Jerome at this time was in the zenith of his fame as a scholar and orator. Laboring under the peculiar spirit of the Christianity of the East, he exerted his whole influence to promote the monastic life. Previous to this the monastic life had found little favor in Italy and Rome; but Jerome organized convents of ladies, generally of high rank, to devote themselves to the monastic life. His zeal in this direction made him unpopular with the clergy of Rome; so much so that when his great friend, the Pontiff Damasus, died he deemed it prudent to quit Rome and seek a home in the East, where the monastic and ascetic life were in great favor.

Jerome settled in Bethlehem, in Judea. The holy associations and hallowed memories of this place were in harmony with Jerome's pious fervor. At this retreat he gave himself up to ascetic habits, frequent devotions and the study of the sacred languages, and to the completion of the greatest and best labor of his life—the translation of the Holy Scriptures. At this place he founded the convents, three for nuns and one for monks. But it is said his life in this quiet solitude was by no means one of unbroken repose, but he hurled frequent and fiery missiles at those he supposed to be the enemies of the true faith and practice of Christianity.

As we have said, the greatest and best work of Jerome's life was to translate the Holy Bible. His translation is known as the Vulgate, and is held in the highest esteem throughout the Roman Catholic world; indeed it is their authentic and authorized version. This translation met with considerable opposition from Jerome's cotemporaries; but its merits, as superior to any other in the Latin tongue, gradually won for it confidence and general reception.

The moral beauty of this great man's life was not a little marred by a certain acerbity, heat and haste. In controversy he did not always regard the law of love, which thinks no evil, suffers long and is kind. Alas, that it has never been written of but One: "I find no fault in him!"

In his seventy-fifth year, worn out by age, labors and infirmities, Jerome met the common fate of mortals, September 30, 420. His printed works amount to nine volumes folio.

The Publishing House Claim.

The Central Christian Advocate, a Northern Methodist paper, published in St. Louis, in its issue of March 17, says:

"The Atlanta Advocate having some time ago asserted, with documentary proof, that the claim of the M. E. Church South Publishing House at Nashville against the United States government was not valid on account of disloyalty during the war, Dr. McFerrin has replied in self-defense. The Advocate returns to the charge, quoting largely from the Nashville Christian Advocate of 1861. We have given little attention to this claim, only knowing that it was reported against in the House of Representatives. We presume there is no probability of its being allowed; certainly not even a possibility of its being allowed if the agents of the Publishing House have to make out a claim of loyalty. But it is a matter with which we, as a church, have nothing to do. The case is between the Methodist Episcopal Church South and the government, and it should stand on the identical grounds of all other claims, without prejudice or favor. No one should desire to obtain any undue advantage in the transaction, for honor and justice in all such matters are worth more than material gain."

The animus of this editorial is evident, and, we are sorry to say, somewhat representative. It is known that the United States government occupied and used our Publishing House from an early day in the war, and usage and justice are at the bottom of the claim for rent and damages. But says this paper: "We presume there is no probability of its being allowed," etc. Again: "But it is a matter with which we, as a church, have nothing to do." Indeed! They are opposing it, yet have nothing to do with it. Their Atlanta and St. Louis and other church papers are obstructing, in every conceivable way, the claim. "But it is a matter with which we, as a church, have nothing to do." There is candor for you.

And the logic is equal to the candor. Suppose the agents of the Publishing House were not "loyal," and that the editor of the Nashville Christian Advocate, in 1861, was not "loyal." What then? Does that convict the whole Methodist Episcopal Church South, and put them in such attitude as to vitiate a just and valid claim before the government of the United States? No matter what were the opinions or overt acts of individuals, does that determine the character and equity of a church? The Methodist Episcopal Church South held no General Conference from 1858 to 1866. That body only can speak authoritatively on such a matter. As it did not meet during the "rebellion," there could not of course be any formal or official deliverance.

Try this Northern Methodist logic the other way. Some of their members were intensely Southern and Confederate in their sympathies and actions. Does that forfeit all or a proportion of the church property? Suppose the editor of one or two, or all their Advocates, had sympathized. Suppose Dr. Carlton, their book agent in New York, had been a sympathizer with "rebels," and even led a Confederate regiment, would that have forfeited the Book Concern to the United States government?—Nashville Christian Advocate.

My Ninety-First Birthday.

MARCH 27, 1784—MARCH 23, 1875.

"Oh! give thanks unto the Lord; for he is good; for his mercy endureth forever." Any man who lives to send forth the salutation of his ninety-first birthday certainly has abundant reason to preface the occasion with this call for thanksgiving. If some one had put to me this morning Pharaoh's question to Jacob: "How old art thou?" I could have replied: "I am this day ninety years old." But I could not have said for the same class of reasons: "Few and evil have been the years of my life." Neither could I have said: "I have not attained unto the years of my fathers;" for I have passed the age of my fathers.

The life of Jacob furnishes a biography so unique as to find no parallel—at least as to his marriage. I suppose there never has been another man whose beloved Rachel cost him fourteen years' labor. These were part of the evil years of his life. In this respect I had a more pleasant time than the patriarch. I obtained my wife without money or price—a free and cheerful gift—and in her the richest inheritance earth had to bestow. I was married when I was twenty-four years, six months and four days old. We lived together forty-one years and seven months, which long period only matured and mellowed first love into richer affection. She closed her noble life May 14, 1850, while I was absent in attendance upon our second General Conference at St. Louis, Missouri. Having finished her domestic duties and read her morning lesson, she sat down to work, and only exclaiming: "What a pain in my head!" expired instantly. During her last years, next to her children, her delight was in an orphan asylum over which she presided; and upon my first visit to her fresh grave I found these orphan mourners gathered around it, and weeping as for a mother gone—a memorial more precious far than the jewels of a queen. She was one of many duplicates of Solomon's inspired conception of a true woman, concerning whom we might almost think he despaired of finding even one. The inspiration, however, was not to illustrate their scarcity, but to magnify their virtues. Those whom he calls virtuous are those in whom moral courage, adequate to life's demands, abounds—such as meet its emergencies with prompt executive firmness and skill. The price of such a woman, he says, "is far above rubies. The heart of her husband doth safely trust in her, so that he shall have no need of spoil." All this I realized in her whom I wedded.

I will be pardoned for thus introducing my deceased wife into this letter. It is due to her memory; and my apology is that much of the credit awarded me in those days when I was in labors more abundant was due to her. It is truthfully said that there being a way is of no avail unless there be a will; and it may be as truthfully said that where there is a will without a way nothing can be effectually done. But in my laborious ministry, everything conspired to its accomplishment. I had the will, and she made the way. If half sick, and open to persuasion to lie up, she was up early, getting everything ready, and with a thousand winning ways persuaded me off, always adding: "I can bear anything better than for you to disappoint a congregation." Of such a wife Solomon says: "Her children arise up and call her blessed; her husband also, and he praiseth her." And it seems to me I might complete the quotation: "Many daughters have done virtuously, but thou excellest them all." But I will not say here what I always felt in my heart. I am recalling those precious memories because I want a reason for saying to my friends that the wives of itinerant Methodist preachers are models of womanly glory, when husband and wife are cast in the same grand mold of self-sacrifice for Christ. It is characteristic of a true woman that when she accepts the sphere of an itinerant minister's wife she intends to fill it; and there are now in this connection many of the most illustrations of womanly greatness and true moral courage that are furnished by the sex. I will therefore only say this much more: A woman who would marry an itinerant Methodist preacher without intending to add to his usefulness is—well, simply a human creature of the feminine gender. But the class described by Solomon have added a constellation of bright stars to our well-won glory in our self-sacrificing toil for the gospel's sake. Many of them are living—a benediction to their husbands, and a blessing to the church of God. Many have passed away—praise to their memory and honor to their dust!

If I live until May next I shall have been an uncompanioned pilgrim for twenty-five years. During most of this time I have filled up the chasm which death made in my life by a more unrestrained itinerancy. My children, being grown and married, I dissipated my loneliness and dispelled the dull monotony of one place by constant change of associates, all loving and kind. By the blessing of my heavenly Father, I was effective for twenty-three of these years, and labored all over my Conference. But now I am no longer able to see or to serve my friends except by this salutation of well-ripened love.

THURSDAY MORNING, MARCH 25.

My ninety-first birthday was celebrated yesterday at Sunshine, by a family reunion of forty loving hearts—twenty-one great grandchildren. Of course it was a lively time, but sweetly so; there was nothing but gushing, joyous life. Of our sumptuous dinner, for obvious reasons, I will not speak. But of two elegantly embossed cakes, with appropriate memorial inscriptions in raised letters of icing—one from Sparta, Georgia, and the other from Louisville, Kentucky—I must say, and so said our lady guests, they would have been among the most conspicuous at a royal feast. At the anniversary of the ninety-first birthday of a worn-down itinerant Methodist preacher they commanded more distinguished respect, and we all remembered the donors with grateful thanks.

To see about eighteen great grandchildren, from twelve years of age down to three, seated with whetted appetites at the second table of such a dinner, is a sight which I hope God will repeat to my children and my children's children. Never was any occasion of the kind more richly enjoyed. Its most memorable feature was the baptism by myself of one grandchild and one great grandchild.

And now, beloved friends, I want you that are praying for my years to be many more, not to ask life for me beyond ability to do some good. I am trying to leave the question of living or dying entirely with my heavenly Father; and yet I would have all my brethren to join me in the prayer that, if according to the will of God, my ninety-second birthday may be spent in heaven. Farewell. L. PIERCE.

Vanderbilt University.

Work on the Vanderbilt University, says the Nashville Banner of March 28, is being pushed rapidly forward, and the institution will be completed and put into full operation by next fall. A large number of ornamental trees, shrubbery and flowers have been planted, and the grounds are being laid off and arranged after the most elaborate style, and will, when completed, present a most magnificent appearance. The grounds will be an attraction as a park, and the place will achieve such a name as will draw hundreds and thousands of people from all over the country to visit an edifice that will not have its superior throughout the Union.

Prof. Lupton, who has been absent for the past seven months in Europe for the purpose of collecting a complete set of chemical apparatus, returned to the city yesterday. The entire apparatus, chemical and philosophical, cost in Europe about $30,000, and is the finest that could be procured. The duty, which is about thirty-three and one-third per cent., or $10,000, will be abated by the government on account of Vanderbilt University.

The students of the Vanderbilt Law School met yesterday to organize a debating society. William L. Sullivan was called to the chair, and Litton Taylor appointed secretary pro tem. Messrs. Burnett, Robertson, Powers and Sullivan were appointed a committee to draw up a constitution and by-laws. This is the first society in the university. The society was named in honor of Commodore Vanderbilt, viz.: "Cornelian Debating Society." The following gentlemen were elected officers: W. L. Sullivan, president; P. B. Robinson, vice president; Litton Taylor, secretary; John Burnett and Henry Powers, critics.—Western Methodist.

SOME OTHER PAPER.—The following paragraph is taken from the Bryan Post, Bryan, Texas, of a late date:

"An honest though indiscreet man" is what the NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE calls Mr. Beecher. This is the same paper which said "Christ looked down with an approving smile" upon the assembly of unmitigated thieves which composed the Kellogg Legislature.

We have never said anything of the sort concerning Mr. Beecher or the Louisiana Legislature. There is a paper published in New Orleans called the Southwestern Advocate. It is the organ of Northern Methodism, and the Post may have found those choice items in its columns. Certainly they were not in the NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

REV. ALEXANDER CLARK, D. D., editor of the Methodist Recorder, Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, gave us a call last week. Sorry that we were able to see so little of him during his two days' stay in New Orleans. Dr. Clark has an enviable reputation as a preacher, lecturer and author, and he certainly edits one of the very best religious papers with which we are acquainted. We have a partial promise from the doctor to visit us again in the fall. We hope it may be convenient for him to do so. We take the liberty of giving an extract from a private note to us, written from McComb City a day or two after he left our city:

"I never was more cordially received among strangers than in New Orleans. Bro. Mathews called, and several kind messages were left for me at the office. Indeed all over the South, last year and year before, as well as now, the Methodist brethren of your branch have been real friends. I esteem the attention. It blesses me in soul and body. Should I visit New Orleans next fall, please say to Bros. Mathews and Walker that I shall be happy to respond to their fraternal requests, and to see their congregations face to face. I am delighted to number you and Bros. Mathews and Harp among my personal friends. Bro. Mathews and I were trying to trace blood relationship back to the North-of-Ireland Protestant Mathews? I 'guess' we succeeded."

REV. JOHN WILKINSON, of the Louisiana Conference, and stationed at Baton Rouge, has been seriously ill of pneumonia for some days. Mrs. Keener left for Baton Rouge on Monday evening, and Bishop Keener on Tuesday evening, a few hours after his arrival from Alabama. A dispatch from Bishop Keener, Wednesday morning, April 7, received just as we go to press, says: "I think Mr. Wilkinson is dying." We fear, from the character of dispatches received on Monday and Tuesday, that it is even so; but we shall hope for the best. God help us. Tidings so heavy have not reached us for a long, long time.

THE following note brings us the sad tidings of the bereavement of Rev. R. S. Woodward, of the Alabama Conference. We pray that God may sustain the sorrowing parents in this deep affliction.

"SUMMERFIELD, ALA., March 29, 1875.

"Mr. Editor: Little Robbie, the son of our pastor, Rev. R. S. Woodward, died of diphtheria, on Saturday morning, the twenty-seventh instant, after an illness of only a few days. Robbie was nearly five years old—a bright, lovely, interesting child, and a general favorite with all.

"This is a great affliction to Bro. Woodward, as it is the first time death has entered his household to pluck the brightest flower there. Bro. Woodward has the sympathies of this entire community, and no doubt he will have the prayers and sympathies of his brethren in the ministry. A. D. McVOY."

MOREAU STREET.—The following note from Bro. Sawyer tells of a good work in the Moreau Street church, and of the spiritually prosperous condition of the charge:

"Mr. Editor: We have just closed a meeting (April 3,) and have to report some twenty-three conversions, three of them being English sailors, who are now on their way to Liverpool, rejoicing in their new-found Savior. We have had nine accessions to the church, making in all twenty-one accessions so far this year. The church membership have been refreshed and revived. God has been with us, and to him be all the honor and glory. JOHN T. SAWYER, Pastor of Moreau St. Church."

WOULD LIKE TO GO.—Bro. Graves invites the editor to attend the Waxahachie District Conference, which meets on the fourth Sunday in July. Wish we could attend, but fear it will be impossible. Would like the best in the world to see Texas; have had a leaning that way from our youth up, but have never got over the border. We have no helper in office or pastorate. How can we go? Thanks to our friends for their remembrance.

REMEMBER the Old Folks' concert at St. Patrick's Hall, on Tuesday night, the thirteenth instant. Let the friends of education turn out in force. The proceeds are for the benefit of Centenary College. No worthier object can appeal to our Christian beneficence.

We understand that there will be some twenty new songs introduced in this concert, and that this is Prof. Beard-lee's last appearance in New Orleans this season.

BISHOP KEENER returned from quite an extended trip in Alabama, on Tuesday morning, April 6. In our next issue he will give us some account of what he saw, and of the state of the church and country. The Bishop dedicated the new church at Eufaula, on Sunday morning, April 4.

THE MACON CHURCHES.—We are gratified to be able to report, says the Southern Christian Advocate of March 31, that a very decided and encouraging state of religious feeling pervades several of the churches of this city. During the past week nightly services have been conducted in Mulberry Street church under the direction of the pastor, Rev. Armilius Wright, with gratifying results. The large congregations have been pervaded by profound solemnity, and at every service the spacious altar railing has been crowded with anxious penitents. Quite a number have, up to the time we write, professed conversion and applied for membership in the church. During the same time a meeting of great interest and promise has been in progress at Jones chapel, Rev. J. W. Simmons, pastor. At First Street, Rev. G. G. N. MacDonell's charge, increased interest is manifest in the congregation, and we hope to be able to report, at an early day, that gracious revivals are also refreshing this congregation, and East Macon, under the ministry of Rev. S. S. Sweet. The indications point hopefully to a most gracious season for the Macon churches. Let the membership see to it that the prospect is not blasted by indifference and unbelief.

MARRIED.

PAY POSTAGE.—Subscribers whose subscriptions have been paid at the old rates—viz.: two dollars per year—and whose subscriptions run into 1875, are required under the new postage law, which goes into effect January 1, to pay postage at the office at mailing. The subscription price hereafter includes the postage. Two cents per month each month that the subscription has to run, will be sufficient to pay for the ADVOCATE.

RISKS ON REMITTANCES.—Money may be sent to the publisher of the ADVOCATE in payment of subscriptions, in amounts not exceeding ten dollars, by registered letter, at his risk. Any amounts may be sent by express or postoffice money order at his risk, provided that in all the above cases the expense of remitting be borne by the person who remits. Otherwise it will be at their own risk.

FAIRBANKS' SCALES are advertised on this page. These are no doubt the standard. Every kind are manufactured, from the postal package scale to those for weighing railroad cars. Mr. W. B. Bowman, at 53 Camp street, is the competent agent, who will satisfy all purchasers in price and kind.

ICE.—We call attention to the advertisement of the Louisiana Ice Manufacturing Company. Those who wish to purchase, in large or small quantities, consult their own interests by buying of this company. As will be seen retail depots are located in different parts of the city.

SELTZER WATER.—We direct attention to the Seltzer water manufactory of Victor Letorey, 51 Poeyfarre street; especially would we invite special attention to his terms and manner of delivering to his customers.

AS THE warm weather is approaching cool soda water will soon be in demand. We can refer those wishing a superior kind to Messrs. Vogel & Vilters, 9 Camp street.

WE HAVE TRIED Brandon's ginger ale and find it decidedly pleasant and refreshing.

DR. WARRINGTON'S medical preparations are advertised in another column.

GET THE LATEST FASHIONS.—Great changes—beautiful designs are just out. Smith's Illustrated Pattern Bazaar is just out, and it is full of the most brilliant illustrations of imported Paris and Vienna styles. As Smith's Bazaar is the acknowledged "authority" upon everything relating to styles, those of our readers who have not subscribed for it ought to at once, while they can do so, and get the large premium now offered. Send only $1.10 to A. Burdette Smith, 914 Broadway, New York city, and he will mail his Bazaar to you for one year without any postage, and give you one dollar's worth of such patterns as you wish to select from his book, free, as your premium, or he will give you your choice of one of his beautiful chromos.

REDUCTION OF FARE.—We direct the special attention of travelers to the advertisement of J. C. Andrews, the gentlemanly ticket agent of the New Orleans, Mobile and Atlanta line. The office of Mr. Andrews is under the St. Charles Hotel, corner of St. Charles and Common streets, where tickets may be obtained, and information with reference to the route will be promptly and politely communicated to inquirers.

L. H. GARDNER.—It will be seen by the notice of dissolution that our well-known and highly esteemed neighbor, L. H. Gardner, has retired from the firm heretofore known as L. H. Gardner & Co., and the business will be hereafter conducted by Mr. Samuel L. Boyd, who will continue to offer the same inducements to wholesale and retail customers.

UNDERTAKER.—Thomas Markey, Esq., nl 40, 42 and 44 Claiborne street, who gives personal attention to his business and has the means of accommodating those who need his services, advertises in another column, and we commend his card to the attention of our readers.

BOOTS AND SHOES.—The attention of our readers is called to the advertisement of William Hogan, manufacturer and dealer in boots and shoes. Mr. Hogan is a practical man, and keeps good leather and good workmen, and his work may be relied upon.

MEDICAL.

THE FAVORITE HOME REMEDY.

This unrivaled Southern Remedy is warranted not to contain a single particle of Mercury, or any injurious mineral substance, but is containing those Southern Roots and Herbs which an all-wise Providence has placed in countries where Liver diseases most prevail. It will cure all Diseases Caused by Derangement of the Liver and Bowels.

PURELY VEGETABLE,

Simmons' Liver Regulator or Medicine is eminently a Family Medicine; and by being kept ready for immediate resort will save many an hour of suffering, and many a dollar in time and doctor's bills.

After over Forty Years' trial it is still receiving the most unqualified testimonials to its virtues from persons of the highest character and responsibility. Eminent physicians commend it as the most for Constipation, Headache, Pain in the Shoulders, Dizziness, Sour Stomach, Bad Taste in the Mouth, Bilious Attacks, Palpitation of the Heart, Pain in the region of the Kidneys, Despondency, Gloom and Forebodings of Evil, all of which are the offspring of a diseased Liver.

EFFECTUAL SPECIFIC

For Dyspepsia or Indigestion.

Armed with this ANTIDOTE, all climates and changes of water and food may be braved without fear. As a Remedy in Malarious Fevers, Bowel Complaints, Restlessness, Jaundice and Nausea

IT HAS NO EQUAL.

The Child's Corner.

THE NEW BOOTS.

BY E. V. S.

Tramping thro' the passage,
Stamping up the stair,
Comes our Lilliputian
With such a manly air.

Who? Why our four-year baby,
Dubbed little Johnny Toots,
In all the full-blown dignity
Of small zouaves and boots.

"The baby sleeps," cries mother;
"Step softly, Johnny, pray."
"What matters it?" quoth Johnny;
"I am a man to-day."

With noisy stride still marching,
He loudly slams the door;
Jean spies him from the kitchen
And rushes out before.

"Och, hide ye, Master Johnny,
Tread lightly an' ye can;
Your boots are unco muddy."
Said Johnnie: "I'm a man."

"A man and gar such trouble"—
O Johnny, Johnny Toots!
The household rues the morning
When first you donned your boots.

The Little Missionary.

LONG MOSS, MISS., March 8, 1875.

MR. EDITOR—Dear Sir: Hoping that many other little boys and girls, and also larger boys and girls, seeing this, may go and do likewise, I relate the following true story:

Little Mannie is a cheerful little boy of just six summers. He is the youngest of a family of four children. He is very fond of playing with his bow and arrow, blow-gun and other little playthings, with which he is well supplied. The dogs and cats (of which he has two each) are his special play-fellows, and he is very careful never to hurt them in any way. He is strictly obedient to papa and mamma, and very obliging to his older sisters and brother.

But I am to tell you how he paid $2 to the missionary cause last fall.

The pastor was on his second round on his circuit. After finishing his sermon he made a short missionary speech, in which he requested a liberal subscription to be collected at his next coming. In passing the hat round the steward came to Mannie and his papa. Others had been subscribing very liberally. Little Mannie, who had been so accustomed to throw in to the Sunday school collections, could not let the opportunity pass. So, when his papa had subscribed and started to hand the paper back, he whispered: "Papa, put me down $2." The question with him now was how he should pay the money subscribed. He had been keeping a little "savings bank" during the year, in which he put his nickels. On his arrival from church he immediately went to his little tin box (for such was his bank) and began to empty it of its contents. On counting he found that he lacked a few nickels of making the amount. He went to work, however, and by various plans added the required amount to his little stock. When the preacher came again Mannie was in his accustomed seat, anxious for the time to come when the hat would come round.

When the hat was passed for collection, with a happy smile on his face, he emptied his pocket-book of every cent it contained. Nor would he have taken one cent back; he was only rejoiced to contribute his little mite. Of course it would not do for me to say that this little five-year-old boy worked and made all this money. No. Some of it was given to him. Sometimes papa or mamma would give him a nickel for some little favor; sometimes brother or sister would give him one for his kindness and obedience. In justice to him I must say, however, that he really earned some of it himself. He says he wants to plant a little cotton patch this year, and, if he makes anything, will give something again this fall. O for a thousand such little missionaries! Should our older members calculate as does this little one, how much better the cause of missions in our church would prosper. Little reader, take little Mannie for your example. T. B. H.

Zip, a Scotch Terrier.

(FROM UNWRITTEN LIVES OF THE DUMB.)

A little boy in Virginia, nine years old, was killed by the falling of a tree. That same morning he had carefully attended to his daily work, cutting kindling wood, and piling it even and neat in little boxes. It was noticed that he sung that morning his favorite hymn, "I want to be an angel," keeping time with his small hatchet. There was no other child in the house, but he had a Scotch terrier, named Zip, who always tried to help him, watching every stick, and running back and forth between the boxes as if he felt the responsibility.

He went to the woods with a gentleman to see some men cutting down forest-trees. It is not known how it occurred, but the boy had scarcely been separated a moment from his friend when a great crash was heard. He was in that direction, and there was no possibility of saving him. The tree fell upon the very spot where he stood, and his soul passed instantly into eternity. No one can describe the state of the family when the news reached them, and a few minutes later, when the little body was brought home that had just left the house full of life and spirit. The wood lay packed in the boxes, by the hatchet. There were the clothes and playthings, but the body was cold and silent.

Amid the keen anguish of his father and mother, and tears of loving friends, there was one mourning in dumb sorrow. It was Zip. He seemed to know that his idol was gone forever, and he never ceased to wander about, as if he had nothing to live for.

Days came and went. The coffin had been borne away with the only son of the household, and it seemed still as death. "I want to be an angel," as sweet as a bird's warbling, no more sounded with the strokes of the hatchet, as it had done before, but it was a precious thought that the dear child had shown an interest in Jesus Christ, and it was believed that he was joining in the "new song" around the throne.

About six months afterward Zip was staying at a friend's. She had been ill of typhoid fever and was recovering. She sat up in bed humming some Sabbath school hymns. As she began, "I want to be an angel," there was a stir in the chimney corner. Zip, who had lain quiet, started up, and, as she proceeded, came toward her, sprang upon the bed with a wild moan, and leaned over her, resting his head gently on her shoulders with cries that went to her very heart. At the close he returned to his place by the chimney, and lay still while she sang a number of Sunday school hymns. The moment, however, that she struck, for the second time, "I want to be an angel," he showed the same disturbance as before, again sprang upon her shoulder with the same wailings, as if he longed for sympathy from some loving human breast.

Every day Zip had heard his young master singing that song, while he worked with his hatchet, and, though so many months had passed, a warm, living affection was deeply rooted in the faithful terrier.

MEDICAL.

DR. C. B. WARRINGTON'S

MEDICAL PREPARATIONS.

The Perfection of Medical Science.

Dr. Warrington's Cough Melange.

☞ Pronounced by all who have used it the very best preparation for the cure of CONSUMPTION, Coughs, Colds, Bronchitis, Hoarseness, Asthma, Whooping Cough, Chronic Coughs, Catarrh, Influenza, Spitting of Blood, Soreness and Tightness of the Breast and Lungs, Night Sweats and Croup. Being prepared from Herbs, Tar and Rock Candy, it is healing, softening and expectorating, and particularly suitable for the cure of all affections of the Throat and Lungs. ☜ Parents will please remember that the Cough Melange is the only sure remedy for Croup.

Full directions accompany each bottle. Price, per bottle, $1, or six bottles for $5.

Dr. Warrington's Analectic Oil.

THE GREAT PAIN DESTROYER.

It Cures the Worst Pain in from Three to Thirty Minutes.

THE GREATEST REMEDY IN THE WORLD for Cholera, Cramps, Diarrhea, Colic, Headache, Neuralgia, Toothache, Scalds, Bilious Colic, Children's Colic, Cholera Infantum, Sick Headache, Nervousness, Nervous Headache, Summer Complaint of Children, Cuts, Sprains and Bruises. Used internally and externally.

As a remedy for Rheumatism it has no equal.

The Analectic Oil is prepared from the most active vegetable remedies. It acts directly on the nervous system, and by restoring the nervous equilibrium it regulates the excretions and secretions of the body. It is also a powerful diffusive stimulant.

For Infants we challenge the world for its equal. It can be administered to infants one week old for Colic or Cramp. Dose, one-half drop to two drops, under three months old; and between three months and one year, two to five drops, in a teaspoonful of milk or water.

☞ REMEMBER. ☜

No preparation equals the Analectic Oil for Cholera, Diarrhea and Cholera Morbus. Try it and be convinced.

Full directions accompany each bottle. Price, $1 per bottle, or six bottles for $5.

RENOVATING BITTERS!!

Purify the Blood.

STRENGTHEN, INVIGORATE AND RENOVATE SYSTEM.

One of the best remedies known for the speedy cure of

DYSPEPSIA,

Loss of Appetite, Sour Stomach, Flatulence, Heartburn, Nausea, Fluttering of the Heart, Fainting Sensations, Sudden Flushes of Heat, Depression of Spirits or Melancholy, Water Brash, and Chronic or Nervous Debility. They are Diuretic, Tonic, Alterative and Stimulant. They perfectly eradicate all Bilious disorders arising from a foul stomach, strengthening the system and regulating the functions of the Liver.

Any one suffering with Weak Nerves, Deranged Liver, Kidney Complaint, Loss of Appetite, Fever and Ague, or any of the diseases or symptoms enumerated above, can be materially benefited and entirely cured by the use of these Bitters.

FOR FEMALES.

It is an established fact that fully one-half of the females are in bad health; or, in other words, never feel well. Many suffer with inward weakness. They feel languid, devoid of energy, extremely nervous, and have no appetite. To this class the Renovating Bitters are especially recommended. Such patients should resort to the use of these Bitters, the invariable result of which will be a strong and healthy constitution, a disappearance of all nervousness, a good appetite and a perfect restoration to health.

Thousands have testified to the merits of these Bitters. I would strongly advise all suffering with the above-named complaints to try them and be convinced.

Full directions accompany each bottle. Price, $1 per bottle, or six bottles for $5.

New Orleans Markets.

From the New Orleans Price Current.

The river is 6 feet 8 inches below high-water mark.

COTTON.—The following are the arrivals since the second instant:

Mississippi river and bayous	1,337
Red river	1,582
Ouachita river	631
Railroads	808
Lake	65
Mobile	1,658
Texas	065
Total	6,146

On Saturday the movement commenced under the favorable influence of a buoyant market at Liverpool, where the sales were 18,000 bales, an improvement to futures at New York, and an advance of 2-10 per cent. in sterling exchange. Factors were consequently more stringent in their pretensions, many of them claiming higher rates, while none were willing to meet the demand unless at full prices, which led buyers to hold off in the hope of doing better later in the day. Others, however, came forward, and during the morning, took about 2,000 bales, mostly at strong prices, without any quotable improvement, but in some cases at an advance of ⅛c., after which light receipts and hardening foreign exchange stimulated the demand in further sales of 4,800 bales, making a total of 6,800 bales. On Monday the sales during the morning, which embraced fully 2,000 bales, were partly at figures showing no quotable change, but mostly an improvement of ⅛c. Later in the day the movement was still more animated, and further transactions were reported to the extent of 3,900 bales, making a total of 5,900. Middling sold at 15⅞@16⅛c., middling to strict middling at 16⅛c., and strict middling at 16⅜@16¾c. On Tuesday the sales summed up 4,050 bales. Prices were pretty steadily maintained.

The above makes an aggregate for the past three days of 16,750 bales, against 13,350 for the corresponding time last week and 19,750 the week before.

The receipts proper at this port since the first of September, exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas, are 929,193 bales, against 1,111,290 bales to the same date last year, and the decrease in the receipts at all the ports up to the latest mail dates, as compared with last year, is 217,411 bales. The decrease by the reports per telegraph is 220,187—3,221,255 against 3,449,442. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same date last year, there is an increase of 37,324 bales to Great Britain, and a decrease of 32,577 to France and 107,334 to other foreign ports. We quote:

Ordinary	13⅛ @ 14⅛
Strict ordinary	14⅛ @ 14⅝
Good ordinary	14⅝ @ 15
Strict good ordinary	15⅛ @ 15⅜
Low middling	15½ @ 15⅞
Strict low middling	15⅞ @ 16
Middling	16 @ 16⅛
Strict middling	16⅛ @ 16⅜
Good middling	16⅜ @ 16⅝
Middling fair	17⅛ @ 17⅜
Fair	17⅜ @ 17⅝

Advertisers' Directory

OF THE

NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

Alphabetically Arranged Under the Heads of the Business or Articles Advertised.

NOTE.—We take no advertisements except from those who we have good reason to believe are respectable and reliable. The publisher urges his solicitor and agents to seek the advertisements of the most worthy and reliable representatives in every branch of business, and not to apply to or accept business from persons of doubtful character. We have refused business to the extent of thousands of dollars each year for want of satisfactory information in reference to applicants. We think we may safely claim for the list below that it embraces, as a rule, the very best men and firms in the different branches represented.

SHADINES—SHADINES.

TO THE PUBLIC.

Five years since, after previous years of experience in the propagation and preservation of Shadines, or young Shad, we first introduced our fish to the American people.

Shadines are put up in hermetically-sealed tin boxes, perfectly boneless, in a mild, pleasing, appetizing sauce, palatable to all, free from oil (so objectionable in sardines,) retaining only the natural richness of the shad, and ready for the table at all times—for dinner, lunch or evening meal—by merely opening the box.

Bear in mind, we are the original and only packers of Shadines, and every genuine box has the letters H. & C. pressed on each side.

The Christian Advocate.

PUBLISHED BY ROBT. J. HARP, FOR THE ALABAMA, MISSISSIPPI AND LOUISIANA CONFERENCES, METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH SOUTH.

VOL. 21. NEW ORLEANS, THURSDAY, APRIL 15, 1875. NO. 16.

News of the Week.

DOMESTIC.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., April 8.—There is no election by the people. The Governorship depends upon the supplemental elections to the Legislature. The law, however, shuts Cutler (Democrat) out from the contest before the Legislature.

Full returns from the State election give the following vote for Governor: Hazard, Independent Republican, 8,717; Lufflitt, regular Republican, 8,341; Cutler, Democrat, 5,169.

ATLANTA, April 8.—Senator Gordon declines to allow his name to be used as a candidate for the nomination of Vice President.

ST. LOUIS, April 8.—Seven Democrats, three Independents and four Republicans were elected to the City Council.

LITTLE ROCK, April 9.—The storm of last evening prostrated telegraph wires in all directions. A number of houses were blown down. Five persons were killed and several were injured. About the same hour the storm struck Texarkana, unroofing the public school building, and fatally wounding and slightly injuring several other children. The water fell in torrents, flooding the streets throughout the city.

OMAHA, April 9.—The number of emigrants westward-bound the present season is unprecedented—9,300 have left here since March 1. Over 1,000 were delayed here yesterday for want of cars, but were sent on special trains to-day.

MAUCH CHUNK, PA., April 13.—It is now conceded on all sides, excepting by a few parties in Hazleton, that the troops now in the middle of the coal-fields have become necessary, and will remain, not so much for fighting purposes, however, but to serve as a guard and keep in check any hostile demonstrations, which are certain to take place should the troops be withdrawn before resumption takes place.

FOREIGN.

MADRID, April 8.—The government has decided to send fifteen thousand soldiers to Cuba.

Senor Salmeron, a professor of the Madrid University, and formerly president of the ministry, and Prof. Azcarate, also of the University, have been arrested. The former has been sent to Lugo, the latter to Miranda. Other arrests are expected.

The government declares its intention of exiling all professors who protest against the recent educational laws, or who resign their chairs on account of their promulgation.

Senor Castelar has resolved to go to Rome.

BERLIN, April 8.—The Bishop of Breslau has refused to resign his see. Legal proceedings will be commenced immediately to enforce compliance with the decree of the court.

BERLIN, April 11.—The Roman Catholic bishops, soon after their conference at Fulda, addressed a petition to the Emperor William in person, remonstrating against the withdrawal of State grants, to the maintenance of which they declared the honor of Prussia was pledged. They also protested against being required to obey unconstitutionally the State laws. The ministers, authorized by the Emperor, have replied, expressing regret that the bishops should object to obey the laws, which were always obeyed in other countries, and adding that the bishops would have preserved the Fatherland from peace-disturbing confusion if they had remained faithful to their own convictions and to the warnings which they proclaimed before the Vatican Council.

PARIS, April 11.—The Moniteur semi-officially declares that France is unanimous for peace as a permanent necessity. She is not conspiring against any one. French papers generally concur in this opinion.

PARIS, April 13.—The L'Union says the Pope made representations through the Patriarch of Venice to the Emperor of Austria that the position of the church is becoming more and more intolerable.

If the unreasonable demands of Prussia are not resisted by Catholic powers the latter will lose all influence, and become subject to German nationality under one sceptre.

The Emperor, replying through the Austrian embassador at Rome, deplores the struggle between Church and State, and advises prudence.

NOW THAT so many meetings are being held in halls and like places, the following story is in order: "An old and weather-worn trapper was recently seen sauntering along the main street of one of our Western villages. Pausing in front of a little meeting-house for a moment, he went in and took his seat among the congregation. The preacher was discoursing on the text of 'the sheep and the wolves,' and had evidently been drawing a contrast between the two subjects. Says he: 'We who assemble here from week to week and do our duty, and perform our part, are the sheep; now who are the wolves?' A pause, and our friend, the trapper, rose to his feet: 'Wa'al, stranger, rather than see the play stop, I will be the wolves!' The preacher was vanquished."

AN associational Bible class is held in New York at five o'clock on Sabbath afternoons, attended by over one thousand people. The interest felt in this class is very great.

BLESSED is he who learns to profit by his wants and infirmities, and who, in all his privations, is still submissive to the will of God.

Meridian District Conference.

MR. EDITOR: The District Conference of the Meridian district, Mississippi Conference, was held at Enterprise, Mississippi, commencing April 2, 1875.

The presiding elder, Rev. J. H. Ellis, presided the first day. J. W. Adkisson was elected secretary.

It being so early in the Conference year, and the time of usual bad weather, the various reports were made largely with reference to what would probably be done during the part of the Conference year yet to come. Preachers all had gone to their work and were found to be faithfully discharging their ministerial duty. Some difficulty was experienced, in certain localities, in their efforts to hold regular class and church meetings; yet the class meeting and the Church Conference are by no means ignored.

Bishop Paine occupied the chair during the second day's session. They who fail to be profited by the experience and counsel of the great and pious—such as that of Bishop Paine—are incapable of entertaining the claims of virtue upon the human heart.

The Sunday school work and the subject of education generally received due attention, and were made prominent in the deliberations of the Conference. The prospect for doing more than usual in the Sunday school cause in this district is bright. The principal drawback in this work among us is the inertia of church talent and of enterprising spirit. We have too many church loungers. They are "combustible," but are not "supporters of combustion" in the blaze of church zeal and enterprise.

East Mississippi Female College was reported in a healthy condition. The standard of scholarship and the thorough drill of the institution receives universal approbation, and is sure to render good results. More pupils are enrolled and more are now attending than at any time last year.

The pulpit services were good. Dr. West, Rev. J. T. Heard and Bishop Paine were the preachers of the occasion. The catalogue recommends itself.

Waynesboro was selected as the place for the next Conference.

V. M. West, S. B. Watts, T. P. Bell and Dr. Rencher were elected delegates to the Annual Conference. Dr. J. R. Webb, —— Edmonson, Geo. McDonald and Alex. Trotter, alternates.

The following, together with the usual complimentary resolutions, were adopted by the Conference:

Resolved, That in view of the recommendation attached to the educational report of the last Annual Conference, and with a view of doing a benefaction to one or two young men within the Meridian district, who by receiving further educational advantages may prove useful to the church, we will proceed to take up collections during the month of May, and direct that the amount collected be expended for the benefit of these young men at Centenary College.

Resolved, That we, as pastors and interested members of the church, invite our esteemed brother, Prof. Adkisson, to visit our churches, at any time he may find it practicable, to address our people on the subjects connected with Sunday school work and education generally.

Resolved, That it is the sense of this Conference that the sacrament of the Lord's Supper should be administered in our societies once a quarter, and in our stations monthly.

Resolved, That inasmuch as there is a great want in many places of earnest, forward-going members to encourage and hold prayer meetings and other social meetings of the church, the pastors and official brethren are recommended to look especially to the duty of developing young men into efficient and working members to lead in these meetings of the church, particularly in prayer meeting.

From the Work.

PRATTVILLE DISTRICT, ALABAMA CONFERENCE.—Mr. Editor: Notwithstanding the sickness in my family, I have been able to reach all the quarterly meetings, except two, on the first round; but owing to excessive rains and very severe weather we were not able to accomplish much. The preachers are all at their posts and faithfully at work. My wife partially recovered from her severe illness, but she is now in bed, and in quite a feeble state of health. We hope for improvement as the weather becomes more favorable. There have been about one hundred and fifty dollars raised for missions.

APRIL 9, 1875.

An Old Soldier of the Cross.

Georgia is a great State. Until the admission of Texas, Virginia, Michigan, Missouri and Georgia were the largest of our States, each having about sixty thousand square miles. Georgia has had a remarkable history. From the days of Oglethorpe down she has had a succession of great men. In civil life her list of worthies is long and brilliant.

In her churches, too, she has had many wonderful men who have passed from earth. A long list of such men might easily be made. Some were Baptists, some Presbyterians, some Moravians, some Episcopalians and some Methodists. The memories of these men are greatly cherished, especially by the neighborhoods or denominations to which they specially belonged. Some of them are historic characters.

But my object at present is to speak of a living man, who has risen to great eminence in one of the churches. You cannot be long in the State without hearing of him. You are soon asked if you know him or have heard him preach. Some say they would rather hear him than any living man. I have heard him, and was not at all disappointed. I hope to hear him again. A friend, who belongs to the same branch of the church with himself, said: "When I hear him, I am satisfied that he is the best preacher I know, until I hear his son; then I like the son best till I again hear the father."

This remarkable man of God was born in Halifax county, North Carolina, on the twenty-fourth of March, 1785. While he was yet a boy his family removed to Barnwell district, South Carolina. In his sixteenth year the Lord drew him with the cords of love and the bands of a man, and led him to behold the Lamb of God. His exercises of mind were strongly marked. His conversion was followed by an early profession of religion. Not long after this his family removed to Washington county, Georgia. In 1804 he was regularly authorized to preach. He dispensed God's word with much zeal and acceptance in many parts of South Carolina and Georgia for eight years. The old people on Lynch's Creek, Great Pedee, Oconee and in other places tell you of having heard him in childhood, or of hearing their parents talk of him. The cities of Columbia, Milledgeville and Augusta also have pleasing traditions of his early ministry.

Pretty early in the war of 1812 he became a chaplain in the army. It is seldom that he now meets with any of the heroes of that day. They have generally passed away. During the war he studied medicine, and after the war was over he attended medical lectures in Philadelphia, took his degree of doctor of medicine, settled in Greensboro, Georgia, and practiced the healing art for six years. But it is not in man that walketh to direct his steps. God had other and better work for him to do. He returned to the pulpit with new zeal, and a determination to spend and be spent in proclaiming salvation. His labors have been chiefly in Georgia, though often rendering good service to the cause of God in other States, especially in South Carolina.

His early education was very imperfect. He went to school not more than six months. But his mind was active, eager and inquiring. He cried after knowledge, and lifted up his voice for understanding. He sought her as silver, and searched for her as for hid treasure. Of course he found the knowledge of God. He has not slighted philosophical studies. At times he has paid much attention to mental science. But his reading through life has been chiefly theological. The fountain of all-saving knowledge—the word of God—has claimed most attention.

In its constituent elements his mind seems to be a rare combination of the poetic and metaphysical. He has very unusual power of attention. For hours he can fix his thoughts on one subject. He is very happy in incorporating practical remarks with abstract thoughts. He thus makes a dry theme attractive to a promiscuous congregation. His style, far removed from meretricious ornament, is yet always neat and quite ornate. But he never so wreathes the sword in flowers as to hinder its cutting power. For mere ornament he seems to care not at all. His figures are parts of his argument. They explain his meaning and deepen the impression he seeks to make.

He has had one of the finest voices. It is now a little broken, but still it is pleasant. It is commonly clear, full and sonorous. For hours he speaks without weariness or change. He always gives pleasure and not pain by his manner of speaking. Of course he is natural. At times he says very terrific things in very solemn tones; but commonly his utterances are winning and tender.

His early ministry was attended with wonderful effects. At times he expresses concern that his ministry has not the signs following that once accompanied it. In this he is not alone. Others are much of the same mind respecting their labors.

This venerable man's piety is the charm of his character. The Bible, the church and the Savior are the themes of his thoughts. Outside of Christ's kingdom he appears to have no business. From him current events gain but a passing notice; but he will talk by the hour of the church, past, present and to come. His old age is serene and cheerful, and the mellowed light of his long day promises a clear sunset, and a blessed, glorious eternity.

His history is blessed. His person is blessed. His influence is blessed. Thousands call him blessed. Yet should he read this paper (but for dates) he would never suspect that it was of himself he was reading. His humility hides his excellencies from his own eyes.

Perhaps I ought to say that I have been writing of Rev. Dr. Lovick Pierce, the father of Bishop George Foster Pierce, both of the Methodist Episcopal Church South. Dr. Pierce has been an effective preacher for seventy years, and will in a few days be ninety years old. Grace, mercy and peace be unto him always.

A PRESBYTERIAN.

N. Y. Observer.

Mexico and Brazil.

A large and very important meeting was held on Sunday evening last, says the New York Observer of March 25, at the Madison Square Presbyterian church, to hear a report from the Rev. M. N. Hutchinson, who has just returned to the United States, having, by a striking providence, escaped the massacre of the Protestants at Acapulco, on the twenty-seventh of January last. Mr. Hutchinson has been stationed at the City of Mexico, where he had general charge of several Protestant churches in that city and vicinity. Some idea of the success of the mission work in Mexico and of the intense hostility which it has excited in the minds of the priests and those who are under their influence may be gathered from the following extracts from the last report of the Presbyterian Board:

"The oldest and largest of the congregations connected with the board is located at Cos, in the State of Zacatecas, sixty miles northeast of the State capital. This is a mining town of 4,000 inhabitants. The congregation, which owes very much in every way to Dr. G. W. Prevost, of Philadelphia, formerly a resident of the place, numbers about 250, is thoroughly organized with a membership of 202, of whom 150 were actually present at a recent communion service. It is under the care of Senor Amado, a well-tried laborer, and has a Sabbath school of 130 pupils. It has a neat chapel, costing $2,000; a printing press furnished by friends in Philadelphia, from which is issued a well-conducted weekly religious newspaper. A boys' school of 45 pupils and a girls' school of 55 have been established.

"Thirty miles east of Cos, and over the State line of San Louis, is Salado, in which a small congregation was spontaneously formed over a year ago. It now numbers twenty persons. Thirty-five miles north of Zacatecas is Fresnillo, in which we have a flourishing congregation of from eighty to one hundred persons, ministered to by a lay preacher partly supported by the board. There is a Sabbath school of twenty-five members. Seventeen adults and several children were recently baptized. At Fresnillo there is a church organization with sixty-three communicants, and one at Cruces with twenty-seven communicants. At Jerez, twenty-five or thirty miles west of Zacatecas, a small congregation has been established, with a membership of six. In Zacatecas, which must be regarded as the central point, a church was organized on the fourteenth of December, in a rented hall, costing $240 per annum. The number present on that occasion was 250. The number baptized in Zacatecas and its out-stations during the year is 146 adults and 30 children.

"Toluca, which is the capital of the State of Mexico, is a city of 30,000 inhabitants, situated in a rich valley, and surrounded by many flourishing towns. About a year since Mr. Phillips found at this place an English layman, Mr. James Pasco, who, while pursuing his secular business, was accustomed to preach to a few of his neighbors on the Sabbath at his own house. Mr. Phillips was so deeply interested in his work that he engaged him to devote the greater part of his time to Christian effort in and around Toluca. The results of Mr. Pasco's labors have been remarkable. The little handful who met in his house have in eight months grown to a congregation of perhaps 200, with 125 communicants. He has organized a church, with three elders and two deacons.

"Some months since the Romish priests, embittered by his successes, posted through the city a placard, embellished with skull and bones, calling the people to a wholesale massacre of the Protestants. The outbreak was expected on the occasion of an approaching festival of the Virgin. Mr. Pasco sent a private messenger to Mr. Hutchinson, who secured from President Lerdo a letter to the Governor of Toluca, ordering him to suppress the mob and protect the Protestants at all hazards. This case will represent the importance of having our missionary work represented at the capital, and with the promptest means of access to our United States minister and the Mexican government. The mob was suppressed at Toluca, but broke out in an adjacent town.

"Eighteen miles from Toluca is Capulhuac, which has already become a radiating center of good to the surrounding hamlets. One member in particular, a full-blooded Indian, is preaching regularly to his own people in an adjacent town. Still another congregation—an outgrowth of persecution, and not yet fully organized—is at Metepec. Briefly, its history is this: In July last a Bible distributor was mobbed by the Catholics. A company of Protestant sympathizers, led by Senor Valero, defended him. Valero was himself mobbed and nearly killed. These persecutions at Metepec, Toluca and Capulhuac have only strengthened the congregations, and greatly increased the circulation of Bibles and religious books.

"The most recent events in Mexico have been of a startling character. While persecutions, attended with mob violence, have broken out in many places, sometimes resulting in the death of native believers, in one instance a missionary, under the care of the American Board of Foreign Missions, has been cruelly assassinated in a midnight attack, instigated by the Romish priesthood."

From Texas.

ON THE CARS, En Route from Austin to Houston, Texas, April 9, 1875.

MR. EDITOR: I promised to give you items from Texas.

Rev. Mr. Paxson and William Reynolds have made a tour of the State, stopping at six or eight points, holding Sunday school conventions. They had large audiences at Austin, Houston and Galveston; and all the various methods of study, the great benefit of the International series of lessons, the importance of teachers' meetings, etc., were discussed with great profit to the teachers of the Sabbath schools.

The special services held in the interest of lay work and special effort for young men, held by Messrs. Hall and Cree, of Washington city, have been largely attended, and have developed some interest in the direction of lay effort. At the meetings in Galveston and Austin all the pastors united in special union services, and some souls were seeking the Savior at both places. The field is indeed very ripe and laborers very few. Pastors all in harmony, and earnestly working for souls.

Yours, GEORGE A. HALL.

THE NEW CHURCH IN EUFAULA, ALABAMA.—We clip the following from the Eufaula Weekly Times of April 7:

Church Dedication.—The new and beautiful Methodist church just completed in this city, on the corner of Eufaula and Barbour streets, was dedicated to the sacred purposes for which it was erected, on Sunday forenoon, by Bishop John C. Keener, assisted by Rev. E. M. Bounds, pastor of the church, and other ministers. The sermon of the Bishop was most able, eloquent and instructive, and the ceremony of dedication solemn and impressive. We have not the time or space to give a full report of the dedication in this issue without missing connection with all outgoing mails this morning.

There is one most remarkable, and, we might say, unprecedented, fact connected with this church edifice, and one which reflects the highest credit upon those who erected it, and that is that they entered it yesterday for divine worship without a single dollar of indebtedness hanging over the building. Every dime due on the building was paid last week, and so far as this church is concerned we shall hear of no lady enterprises in the way of fairs, ice-cream and strawberry festivals, mite meetings, soirees, etc., to raise funds to get their church out of debt. Who ever heard of such a fine church being built in so small a city, and every dollar of its cost plunked down in cash when the work was done? We are not a Methodist, but it seems to us that there is a vast deal of pure and undefiled religion in that way of doing business.

REVIVAL AT ALBANY, OREGON.—Bro. Parsons: We are in the midst of a wonderful baptism of the Spirit at Albany. Over one hundred have professed conversion, and the meeting is still going on. All the churches united and working in harmony. Our membership is especially blessed and greatly increased; I do not know the number yet. Have been laboring here three or four weeks; will proceed immediately to build a church; have already money enough subscribed to begin. Glory to God for the power of the gospel to save sinners! Have not time to write more. Affectionately in Christ,

T. B. WHITE.

Pacific Methodist.

The same paper says that large crowds continue to fill Union Hall and other places in San Francisco where services are held under Mr. Hammond's direction. A great number of converts are reported and the religious sentiment of this city is stirred as never before. Street preaching by laymen is becoming frequent and effectual. All classes of our people are agitated by the prevailing movement.

THE Harvard School of Theology will open at Cumberland Gap, Tennessee, on the first of July, 1875. The first camp will be formed in the Gap, and other camps will be set up as the school moves through the region of the upper Cumberland.

IT has been remarked that one was brought to repentance in a dying hour, to show that none should despair even then; and but one, to show the presumption of delaying repentance to that awful moment.

Revivals.

The Southern Christian Advocate of April 7 has the following revival items:

THE REVIVAL IN MACON.—The unusual religious interest mentioned in these columns last week has steadily increased, until it has ripened into a visitation of rare power and fruitfulness. At Jones' chapel, Rev. J. W. Simmons, assisted from time to time by other ministers, continues to hold services every night, with encouraging results. The main interest, however, centers at Mulberry Street church, where services are held every night, and also each day from twelve to one o'clock. These services have, under the blessing of God, acquired a spiritual momentum which bears them grandly over all obstacles, and demonstrates the genuineness of the work in progress. The noonday services are well attended; and at night—notwithstanding various entertainments in the city, which ordinarily operate unfavorably upon the size of the congregations—the spacious edifice is crowded with solemnly attentive listeners. Every service is signalized by palpable manifestations of the Spirit's influences; and it is long since we have witnessed such a joyous scene as one during the past week, when, after the congregation had been dismissed, nine persons, who lingered at the place of prayer, professed the conscious pardon of their sins. Rev. Arminius Wright has added sixty-four to the membership of this church since the beginning of the year. Of this number forty-six have been added upon profession of faith since the commencement of these special services.

REVIVAL IN OXFORD.—A friend adds to a business letter of March 29 the following most gratifying intelligence: "A most gracious revival is in progress at this place. Many have been soundly converted, and many are under deep conviction. The old church has resounded with the shouts of new-born souls during the last week.

"Last Friday afternoon, at a prayer meeting held in the college chapel, every member of the college who lives in town was present except one, and he was compelled to leave, but left word that all would pray for him. After the meeting was over the boys lingered around the vestibule and shouted the graises of God.

"We have not had such a meeting at this place for years. The Holy Spirit is with us. Very little preaching is done. Dr. Haygood simply reads extracts from the Bible and makes a few comments; then follows the invitation, when the altar is crowded with seekers. The Lord is doing wonderful things for us."

Hard Times and the New York Churches.

Even the war panic was not as crushing to our churches as the present one. The First Baptist church are having a time with their pastor. The trustees cut his salary down $1,000, simply because the society could not pay what it had agreed to. The pastor took umbrage and resigned. Quite a majority desired him to withdraw the resignation. He refuses to withdraw it unless the trustees will back down, and the trustees refuse to do this. The parish over which the Rev. Mr. Clark was settled—brother of Horace F.—built a costly church in Brooklyn, under the lead of a real estate speculator. The embarrassments are so great that the pastor has resigned and the church will probably be sold. The Puritan Church started to build a neat, commodious house of worship, costing in all $60,000. They brought up with a brown-stone lecture-room and a debt of $90,000, with no prospect of paying it. Dr. Cheever's old church on Union Square was taken down, stone by stone, and reproduced on Fifty-Third street, making one of the most commodious Baptist churches in the city. In prosperous times the heavy load assumed by the young church might have been carried; but as it is the society seems to be hopelessly embarrassed. It is said the pastor intends to resign and take a charge in New Jersey. It is understood that the Baptist Union will interfere to save this fine property to the denomination. The State Street church, Brooklyn, has had a peculiar history. It was an Independent Methodist church. It then became a Congregational, and settled a Methodist as pastor. He died, and the society then sent South and obtained another Methodist. He was not a success. A union was formed between this and the Elam Place church. The union so far has not been fruitful. A pastor cannot be found. The parish is now negotiating with a popular Methodist preacher to occupy the pulpit.—New York Correspondent of Boston Journal.

THE LAST Primitive Methodist chronicles very extensive revivals pervading all classes of British society, and refers to a Catholic priest who entered a railway carriage where one of his flock was reading the little hymn-book. She looked up in amazement when she saw the priest looking at her. He said to her: "Don't be alarmed; I also have been to these meetings. I shall ever thank God for it." Then turning to the little hymn, "The Water of Life," etc., he said: "It was while they were singing that hymn that I felt relief. I am now going to Manchester to hear Mr. Moody again. But I shall never return a Roman Catholic priest."

A LYRIC.

(COMPOSED BY REV. STEPHEN E. JOHNSON, Late of Hazlehurst, Miss., in his eighty-second year.

I.—WHEN?

When shall I die? When will this transient dream
When cross the myst'ry stream
So many dear to me have gone?" fain
A little longer on earth to remain."

Will it be winter, when the frozen ground
Is all with coldness bound,
And yield no leaf nor bud to pick and spade
By which my narrow sleeping-room is made?

Will it be in the genial, balmy spring,
When flowers appear, and birds delighted sing
Among the branches, and in artless lays
Pour forth their hymns of gratitude and praise?

Will it be summer, when the glorious sun
Along the bright ecliptic road doth run?
His longest course, and man and beast repose
To shade or shelter from the solar heat?

Will it be autumn, when the gathered sheaves
Proclaim the end of harvest, and the leaves,
Which in rich verdure lately crowned the fields,
Come rustling down with every passing breeze?

Will it be on the day of sacred rest,
When holy thoughts alone should fill the breast,
When Christians meet to hear, to praise and pray,
That I from loved ones shall be called away?

Will it be on a busy working day
When I must quit this tenement of clay?
When there are but a few who can attend
To pay the last sad office to a friend?

Will it be morning, midday or at night
When my enfranchised spirit takes its flight?
These secrets all belong to Him alone,
The King, who fills the universal throne.

II.—WHERE?

Where shall I die? Where lay this body down?
At my dear country home, or in some town,
Where I, a stranger, may have no one near
My eyes to close or my last words to hear?

Will it be near the blazing, at some inn
Where men do congregate with noisy din,
That my old native powers, so worn and frail,
Must yield, and my poor flesh and heart must fail?

Will it be near the shaded, flowing brink
Of some cool brook, where I may kneel and drink
One more refreshing draught, and thence to go
To streams where living waters ever flow?

Will it be on some lofty mountain's top,
Which I may gain by effort, and there stop
To view the vast and glorious landscape o'er,
Then "gather up my feet" and walk no more?

Will it be in a grotto or some lonely dell,
Where human beings scarcely ever dwell,
Where I may find at once, in a dark cave,
A dying chamber and a ready grave?

Will it be in the house of some kind friend
Where all my anxious thoughts and cares shall end,
And I be laid away my rest to take
Until the resurrection morn shall break?

III.—HOW?

How shall I die? In calm and heavenly peace,
When the last throbbings of my heart shall cease?
That peace all human understanding past,
And which to all eternity must last?

Shall I be tempted to distrust that love
That brought the Savior from the courts above,
That he atonement fair for all should make
Who should believe, repent and sin forsake?

Shall I be scorched by fever, racked by pain,
And of the dealings of the Lord complain?
Or shall I with due meekness acquiesce
In his disposal, and his chastening bless?

Shall I be favored with such strength of mind,
When leaving dull mortality behind
To take the place prepared for me above,
That I may testify that "God is love?"

Will spirits ministrant their vigils keep Around me as I gently fall "asleep
In Jesus," who redeemed me, and will own
My worthless name before his Father's throne?

These questions, which have frequently revolved
Within my anxious heart, will then be solved,
And I to him in adoration bow
Who only knows the When, the Where and How.

S. E. JOHNSON.

Smith's Reply to Jones.

CONFIDENTIAL LETTER RECEIVED SINCE CONFERENCE.

DEAR JONES: You have no idea how delighted I was, the other day, as our Irish postmaster said, "Misther Smith, here's a lither for ye," to find it was from Jones, "the dear old fellow." I was a little disappointed however, at your philosopher-like analysis of my proposition to you to transfer to Louisiana. Such questions as you put to me, as to how preachers' wives and children are cared for, looks a little like saying: "You can't throw sand in my eyes that way." But I'll tell you this thing of transferring away off is not the joke it's cracked up to be. We have some who have gone, whose very fragrance is with us yet, and who were to us as the apple of our eye, never, never to return! But, Jones, it is too true that people's love for their preacher often decreases just in proportion to the size of his family. It is a little like the case of a gentleman once at a dining who desired an introduction to a charming young lady. The joke was humored. He was introduced to Mrs. ——. "Misery!" said he afterward; "I saw wrinkles in her face that very instant." Why is it, Jones, you reckon, that single preachers are so much in demand, and married ones so much below par? It certainly cannot be that they are more useful, happy, experienced, or are better preachers. Besides, if he comes single, especially if he is good-looking, the good mammas and the primpy daughters will do their prettiest to forestall a determination on his part to remain so.

Jones, you tell me you have been to college way up to Vanderbilt—the great university. I am like the little boy in the old Third Reader, who asked his papa: "How big was Alexander, pa? . . ey call him 'Great.'" Does its . . e "touch the sky?" "No," said . . father, "he was about as big as . . James or I." And so it is, somehow or other, with all "great" enterprises. We have gotten into the way of blowing and puffing things that some day the Lord will touch us with an arrow and let all "the wind" upon which the Ephraims are now feeding out of their sails. Oh, what a repentance will then come over us as we reflect that "pride goeth before a fall." I do not want to be captious, or classed with old fogies and croakers, but I lay my hand upon my heart as I say it: There are men now leading Methodism rapidly along the high road to ruin. History repeats itself—formerly once in five centuries, but now once in about a century and a half. If Stephens' History of Methodism is a true one, the Methodism of 1875 is no more that of a century ago than the constitution of 1875 is that of 1797. I have heard great, flowery reports about "revivals," "the slain of the Lord were many," and all such expressions; but I have been a traveling preacher nearly eight years, and have traveled largely within the bounds of three Conferences, and I have never met up with many of them yet. I have been to camp meetings and to protracted efforts where the altars were crowded, and all you could see in a general way was that the heart was only touched and not broken. Who would compare the stylish, verbatim et literatim sort of preaching we now have to the Demosthenic force of the early pioneer preaching, or to the Pauline power of those untutored (save only in the love of God) men who brought our fathers into the church of Christ? The apostles spoke the word of God with all boldness—a thing I have but on few occasions ever heard; and yet I hear them say of nearly every preacher I meet, moderate or immoderate in ability: "Oh, he is a very fine preacher." Jones, "the young America" has struck us with a moral paralysis. We have somehow gotten the idea that a young preacher, or any kind of a preacher, must "win his spurs." Preachers must be made to order, just like a buggy, a wagon or a pair of boots. Vanderbilt, for instance, is to train preachers in "the higher education." It is to put the steeple upon the spiritual edifice already erected, and then a bell in it, that the preacher may sound his own praise abroad. Indeed we are trying to ape the haughty, ill-mannered ministerial culture of some other sects I could mention; and for what? Why to "take position." And in order to get the money to do this—to get up those big wind-mills—"the pride of the church" is appealed to. My crucified Master, dost thou bless such ministrations? Mark Twain is doubtless an irreligious man, but he hit the nail on the head when he said: "Alas, for this golden age!" and we will add: "Of Methodism." Well, Jones, I have one relief—that is, God will raise up out of all institutions men for his own work. We need a general raising just about this time.

Jones, how do you like our Advocate? But then I ought not to ask the question in that shape, for Dr. Bledsoe says that is suggesting the sort of an answer you desire to have. I think some of our Advocates need a hauling over the coals, and as I am only writing to you I believe I will attempt it. I begin at the head. The Nashville Advocate is some weeks nothing more than a budget of thanks and compliments, and tokens of appreciation of the editor's personal friends, who, I doubt not, are all of the right sort; but then you see, Jones, I don't know them from "the man in the moon," and there are ten thousand more like me, who feel that the editor is doing a wrong in making the church organ a vehicle to subserve his social pleasantries. Then, Jones, it literally smells oily. You see a preachers' directory. Why, what interest have twenty thousand church members in that? Had we not better all of us send up our names and places of residence? It would be news to somebody, no doubt. I'd have no objections; would even think it right to keep a directory of the Bishops' places of residence, as there are often persons who wish to address them by letter who are unacquainted with their postoffices. Another week you will find fashion plates and the Lord knows what sort of blowing advertisements. It reminds me of Beecher proposing to rent the privilege of his pulpit, one hour after service, for the purpose of giving out notices, every man to pay according to the number of minutes they occupied each Sabbath. It is like telegraphy—so much a word. Oh, Jones, to think we as a church are responsible for this! And yet we cannot help it, but have to submit just because we are not in the ring. Now we will "dress up" our New Orleans man; and the first thing we say is that the bipartite functions of editor and publisher cannot be reconciled in the same paper. The editor, for instance, says something about prayer driving satan away; but you turn over and you find a picture of a lion with a man in his mouth, and a woman and two children running. You read what the publisher says about the strange picture, and it is this: "If you want the devil kept out of your house, send for the Metaphysician, published by Mrs." somebody and her daughter. Now who are we poor blind ones to believe? The Bible tells us the editor is right, but the Conference says the publisher is right too. Then there are some of those advertisements that if a man sends his dime to find out how to get rich, he never hears of it any more. Oh, this golden age!

Well, Jones, I believe if you and I will just keep striking now we will see the benefit of our labors after awhile. It is not the stump speaker that sways the masses who keeps the world alive, but it is the poor fellow who is out in the field, pulling out the weeds and grass while he is spouting about who shall be Governor. Jones, it does me good, when I think of these things, to strike up a song:

"Our friendship sanctify and guide,
Unmixed with selfishness and pride:
Thy glory be our single aim!"

I wish that it were in every instance. By the way, our new tunebook is par excellent. I do not care if it did come from Nashville. But there is some terrible poor, thin stuff in it for church music. Let me recommend to you some unsurpassed tunes for congregational use: Shirland, Warwick, Warrington, Amsterdam, Avon, Alridge, Rockingham (especially fine,) Effingham and Uxbridge. All these are fine, and will keep anybody alive. In the Miscellany "The Land of Beulah" and "Sweet Hour of Prayer" are, to my notion, second only to the "Old Ship of Zion." My love to your dear ones. Your brother, JOHN SMITH.

Contrary to Our Articles and Standards.

MR. EDITOR: The Rev. S. P. Richardson has written an article or two on the question whether Adam was created holy or not. One other writer seems to agree with him. I wish simply to call attention to the awkwardness of their position. They put themselves in opposition to our recognized lexicographers. What is holiness? "The state or quality of being holy; purity or integrity of moral character; freedom from sin; sanctity."—Webster. If this be holiness, can they deny that Adam was created holy? They may wish to give another definition to the word, but they will not be permitted to change at pleasure the meaning of words.

They put themselves in opposition to the theological standards of their own church. Watson quotes with approbation these words from Dr. Watts, referring to Adam, as at first created: "A rational creature, thus made, must not only be innocent and free, but must be formed holy. His will must have an inward bias to virtue; he must have an inclination to please that God who made him; a supreme love to his Creator, a zeal to serve him, and a tender fear of offending him. For either the new-created man loved God supremely, or not. If he did not, he was not innocent, since the law of nature requires a supreme love to God. If he did, he stood ready for every act of obedience; and this is true holiness of heart."

In the same chapter he says further: "The creation of man in the moral image of God being so clearly stated in the Scriptures, it would be difficult to conceive in what manner their testimony, in this point, could be evaded, did we not know the readiness with which some minds form objections, and how little ingenuity is required to make objections plausible." The objection to this clearly revealed truth is thus stated by Dr. Taylor: "Adam could not be originally created in righteousness and true holiness, because habits of holiness cannot be created without our knowledge, concurrence or consent; for holiness in its nature implies the choice and consent of a moral agent, without which it cannot be holiness." This is the same objection that the Rev. S. P. Richardson urges. "The fallacy" of which "is, however, easily detected. It lies in confounding 'habits of holiness' with the principle of holiness." Wesley's answer to this objection is then given: "What is holiness? Is it not essentially love?—the love of God and of all mankind, love producing 'bowels of mercies,' humbleness of mind, meekness, gentleness, long suffering. And cannot God shed abroad this love in any soul, without his concurrence, antecedent to his knowledge or consent? And supposing this to be done, will love change its nature? Will it be no longer holiness? This argument can never be sustained unless you would play with the word habits. Love is holiness wherever it exists. And God could create either men or angels endued from the very first moment of their existence with whatsoever degree of love he pleased. You think, on the contrary, it is demonstration—that we cannot observe what is right, without our own free and explicit choice. I suppose you mean practice what is right. But a man may be righteous before he does what is right, holy in heart before he is holy in life. The confounding of these two all along seems the ground of your strange imagination that Adam 'must choose to be righteous, must exercise thought and reflection before he could be righteous.' Why so? 'Because righteousness is the right use and application of our powers.' Here is your capital mistake. No, it is not. It is the right state of our powers. It is the right disposition of our souls, the right temper of our mind. Take this with you, and you will no more dream that God could not create man in righteousness and true holiness."—Watson's Institutes, part 2, chapter 18.

Are not the views of Bro. Richardson contrary to our articles of religion?

But should it be said, in reply, that the doctrine in question is not contained in the Articles of Religion, reference might be asked to Bishop McTyeire's Manual of the Discipline, section 3, 5, of the edition of 1870. There it is said: "The phrase, 'doctrines which are contrary to our Articles of Religion,' is evidently elliptical. Some of the leading and characteristic doctrines of Methodism are not mentioned in the twenty-five technically called Articles of Religion. Usage and general consent indicate these 'standard" (mentioned in the first restrictive rule) "expositions of the Bible to be Wesley's sermons.—Watson's Theological Institutes," etc.

The Church Conference.

MR. EDITOR: The Church-Conference is a clearly defined part of the system of Southern Methodism, and the success of any system depends in a great measure upon the effectual working of the parts composing it. This may be considered an inferior part of the great body of Methodism, and the leaders of our hosts may lose sight of the fact that it is the starting-point to eminence in the deliberative bodies of the church. All the Conferences avail themselves of the Advocates to give publicity to their interests and urge their claims upon the church. The Church Conference needs an occasional notice; the thousands of members are entitled to it; its recent institution renders it important to acquaint the people with its work. The Church Conference is an important body in the promotion of the interests of the Redeemer's kingdom, and yet it is not appreciated as it ought to be. It is not coming up to the expectations of those who were in favor of its enactment. Its duties are clearly laid down, and its meetings are made as indispensable and imperative as those of the higher Conferences, and where they are held regularly the church prospers.

The Discipline makes it the duty of "all the members of the church" to come together once a month, or on circuits at least every three months, at every appointment, to hold a Church Conference, over which the preacher in charge shall preside. The general order of business in this Conference embraces all the interests of the church, and the members who take part in it become familiar with its labors and engage more heartily in carrying out its plans. The Church Conference tests the life and health of the church. If reports come up showing successful labor in the various fields, it may be considered a thriving church; but if there is nothing to report, it is a poor, sickly one. Faithful work is the sure method of church life, and the Church Conference has recognized this fact and provided for it. Yet, strange as it may appear, there are churches of long standing in our communion that know but little about these meetings. It may be the fault of the pastors. If so, they ought to amend their way in this respect. The preacher in charge, as presiding officer, should call the members together as the rule requires. But the members take no interest in the church meeting. They have never witnessed one, and they do not understand it. They must be made acquainted with it before they can appreciate it. I have seen many members of the church leave the house, in company with those who were not members, at the opening of the Church Conference. Now all the members ought to know that it is their duty to attend every meeting of the Church Conference, and that it is their right to take part in its deliberations. It is difficult to see how it is that any one who is interested for the church and desirous of aiding in its movements can willfully be absent from these meetings. The members ought to feel as much bound to attend the Church Conference as the members of the Quarterly, District, Annual and General Conferences are to attend their meetings.

Obituaries.

DIED, of pneumonia, at Suggsville, Alabama, March 26, 1875, after a long and painful illness, JAMES BAIRD, infant twin son of P. H. and A. E. Booth, aged seven months and twenty-eight days.

MRS. JULIA F. SMITH (nee Hudson) was born in Mecklenburg county, Virginia, February 14, 1831. In 1847 her father removed to Marengo county, Alabama, and settled near the town of Jefferson, where she was united in marriage to Bro. Levi Smith, December 20, 1849. At a camp meeting held near Linden, in 1854, she was converted and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church South, and lived a consistent member of the same until her death, which occurred March 12, 1875.

Sister Smith was a model wife, energetic and prudent in the management of all her resources, a kind neighbor, a faithful friend and a sincere Christian. Though diffident oftentimes, and sometimes quite despondent as regarded her spiritual condition, yet in the moment of supreme trial her faith was superior to all the foes of darkness, and she calmly triumphed even in the agonies of death. Though able to converse but little, her last utterances were satisfactory to all her friends, testifying to the grace of God as manifested to the eye of faith in her redemption from all sin, and an inward consciousness of peace which the world could not take away.

R. B. CRAWFORD.

MR. WILLIAM E. CLARK was born in Mobile, November 10, 1829, and died, at his residence in Jackson county, Mississippi, February 7, 1875, aged forty-five years, two months and twenty-seven days.

The circumstances attending the death of Mr. Clark were sad in the extreme. The day previous to his death he was in good health, and drove to Moss Point, a distance of about ten miles, and on his return home about seven o'clock, just as he drove into his yard, his horse became frightened and ran until he freed himself from the buggy. Mr. Clark was found hanging to the wrecked buggy, apparently in a lifeless condition, but recovered somewhat and lived until about two o'clock the next day, but was unable to speak so as to be understood. It would be impossible to describe the shock produced in the neighborhood where he lived by this unexpected event. His many friends gathered about his last remains with sad, tearful faces, that told how much they loved him. And the burning tears and heart-rending sobs that broke forth from his disconsolate widow and doubly bereaved mother told but too plainly how little they were prepared to speak the last earthly farewell.

Mr. Clark was baptized in childhood and was reared under the influences of religion, but, like many young men, went away from those old paths—this good way—into the ways of sin. And yet he was not a sinner of the grosser sort. He ever had a reverence for the good way and a respect for the good. About twelve months before his death he became a teacher in a Sunday school. This led him to read the Bible more attentively than he had ever done before, and consequently an interest was awakened in his mind and heart in reference to a better life. He became a seeker of religion, and attended upon the means of grace, took an unusual interest in his Sunday school class, and read those books and sang those songs that tended to the knowledge and love of God. His favorite hymn was "Rock of ages, cleft for me," and his preference was so great for this incomparable hymn that he induced his Sunday school class to memorize it. He did not unite with the church, but often said he intended to do so when he was better satisfied with his religious experience, or when he felt that he had strength to stand firmly. He said some of his habits were so strong that he was fearful that he would violate the rules of the church, and he would thereby bring reproach upon the cause. But those that knew him best mourn for him not without hope. In his death the country at large has lost a true patriot, this county a faithful, trustworthy officer, the community in which he lived one of its most intelligent and beloved members, his friends one that was true to the mark in his friendship, his brothers and sisters an affectionate brother, his mother a dutiful son, and his wife a doting husband. These all gather about the grave of the departed one, and look down into its dark, gloomy vault, and cry: "Alas! alas!" But the Bible bids us hope and say: "It is well." "All things work together for good to them that love God."

EDWARD FRANKLIN COOPER.

Edward Franklin Cooper is no more. Death has made many breaches in the ranks of our beloved Methodism in Alabama during the last few months. In some families and districts chasm after chasm has been opened. The family of the late Dr. Jefferson Hamilton furnishes a case in point. On the twenty-second of February, 1874, his daughter Mattie, the wife of Bro. Cooper, was summoned away from earth and loved ones. Her distinguished father was called to his reward in heaven, and now it is our painful duty to record the death of her husband. The Christian public will sympathize with Sister Hamilton and the mother of Bro. Cooper in the three bereavements that have fallen in such quick succession and with such crushing weight upon their hearts. Bro. Cooper was born in Mobile, August 7, 1836. He was a bright, cheerful boy, full of hope and earnestness. His love of truth was manifested at an early period, and so strong was it that it tinged his whole character from early youth to the close of life. He possessed a transparency and frankness which gave a peculiar charm to all that he said and did. He was wonderfully free from all duplicity and intrigue, dealing kindly and candidly with all with whom he was thrown in social and business life. His respect for his parents was of that exalted nature inculcated by the word of God. He obeyed his parents in the Lord in all things. After the death of his father his devotion to his widowed mother was beautiful. He never forgot her, and on all occasions he sought opportunities to gratify her wishes, and to pour the light of hope and joy into her heart. He seemed to feel, from childhood to mature age, that nothing that he could do would ever repay her for the care and toils which a faithful mother had bestowed upon him, and for the Christian example which she had given to her household. When quite a child he was deeply impressed with religious truth, and, when only in his fifth year, would urge his mother to pray for him, and to teach him to see and hear his great Father in heaven. He attended the Sunday school, frequented the house of God, and took great delight in the use of all the means of grace. He was converted and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church South, in the Franklin Street church, Mobile, under the ministry of Dr. Hamilton. This blessed change took place in the fourteenth year of his age. As the door of the kingdom of God was thrown open to him in converting grace he became inexpressibly happy. Months and years rolled away before a cloud of gloom or doubt rested upon his mind. When doubt and trial did come he had learned the way to the throne of grace, to which he went constantly, until complete deliverance was found. As he approximated mature manhood he could truthfully say: "My heart is fixed, O God, my heart is fixed." At the commencement of the late war he entered the Confederate service as lieutenant of Company B, Gulf City Guards. He was a good soldier, a faithful officer, and an heroic defender of the sunny land in which he was born. He was wounded at the battle of Chickamauga, from the results of which he never fully recovered. Soon after the close of the war he settled in Selma, and in a few years became one of the most successful business men in that commercial emporium. He was married to Mattie Hamilton, daughter of Dr. Jefferson Hamilton, September 15, 1869. Their union was a most fortunate and happy one. The exalted ideas of marriage conceived by an old divine—"one soul in two bodies"—was true in their case. While they were devoted to each other they loved the Lord their God with all their hearts, souls, minds and strength. Theirs was truly a Christian home, where the prophet of God was welcomed and refreshed, and whence he went forth invigorated to the holy work which his divine Master had given him to do. From the private, social and business life of Bro. Cooper there went out continually the savor of Christian purity, and the light of a bright, consistent example. He loved his kindred, doing all in his power for their temporal and spiritual prosperity; was public-spirited, ready to put his shoulder to every noble enterprise, and he gave largely of his time and means to sustain and push forward the interests of religion. With him Christ and his cause were first, and they were never neglected for any human or worldly considerations. The last active hour of his life was given to the church in Selma. His work being finished, he returned to his office, was taken with a chill, went home, took his bed, to rise no more until his spirit was released from its fleshly tenement. It was not believed at first that his condition was critical; neither he nor his friends dreamed that his end was so near. The severe cold settling on his lungs, pneumonia soon hurried him to the brink of "the dark river." When informed that he must die, he said: "It is all right." He gave directions concerning his temporal interests, then called his friends and kindred to his side, exhorted them to give their hearts and lives to God, and obtained from many who were present the promise to meet him in heaven. He united with others in singing: "Rock of ages, cleft for me." While praying for him one of his brethren used the Lord's Prayer, and the deceased repeated after him, with great emphasis, the petition: "Thy will be done." He continued in this happy frame of mind until he fell "asleep in Jesus," soon to awake in the light and glory of eternal blessedness. It is sad to lose such a man at a time like this, when every temporal and spiritual interest that is dear to humanity needs his presence and influence. His widowed mother will miss him; his bereaved brothers and their families will mourn his early death; while the church and the country must feel the loss of such a man. But it is joyous to know that his work was done, and that when "the Master" called him his soul was in conscious readiness for his transfer to the realm of everlasting life. We are compensated for all our losses in the sweet assurance that husband and wife and father and son have met on high.

HEAVIER THE CROSS.

Heavier the cross, the nearer heaven;
No cross without, no God within—
Death, judgment from the heart are driven
Amid the world's false glare and din.
Oh! happy he, with all his loss,
Whom God hath set beneath the cross.

Heavier the cross, the better Christian;
This is the touchstone God applies.
How many a garden would be wasting,
Unwet by showers from weeping eyes!
The gold by fire is purified;
The Christian is by trouble tried.

Heavier the cross, the stronger faith;
The loaded palm strikes deeper root;
The vine-juice sweetly lasteth
When men have pressed the clustered fruit;
And courage grows where dangers come,
Like pearls beneath the salt sea foam.

Heavier the cross, the fearlier prayer;
The bruised reeds most fragrant are;
If sky and wind were always fair
The sailor would not watch the star;
And David's psalms had ne'er been sung
If grief his heart had never wrung.

Heavier the cross, the more aspiring;
From vales we climb to mountain-crest;
The pilgrim of the desert, tiring,
Longs for the Canaan of his rest;
The dove has here no rest in sight,
And to the ark she wings her flight.

Heavier the cross, the easier dying—
Death is a friendlier face to see;
To the's decay one bids defying,
From life's distress one then is free.
The cross sublimely lifts our faith
To him who triumphed over death.

Thou Crucified! the cross I carry,
The longer may it dearer be;
And, lest I faint while here I tarry,
Implant thou such a heart in me
That faith, hope, love may flourish there,
Till for the cross my crown I wear.

The Red Hat.

The Romanists are delighted with having an American cardinal. Their Pope has elevated Archbishop McCloskey to this office, with the expectation that the act will tell powerfully upon the interests of Romanism in Europe as well as in America. Archbishop Bayley, of Baltimore, is reported to have said: "Certainly no country deserves more of the holy father's love than the United States. The church here is numerically strong and is increasing every year. Its archbishops and bishops number almost as many as the full College of Cardinals." "The selection, it is evident, was made with the view of honoring the Catholics of the United States, to testify the esteem in which Archbishop McCloskey is held by the holy father, and as a compliment to the nation."

We can appreciate the exuberant satisfaction of the hierarchy and of the people whom these bishops and priests represent in this event; but when we are told that Pius the Ninth intends it "as a compliment to the nation" we doubt much if the thirty-three millions of our non-papal population will be disposed to receive it as such. The only exceptions which we have noticed are in the sycophantic utterances of some political newspapers, which are readily interpreted.

The Archbishop of Baltimore is also reported as saying that possibly the cardinal may be called by the Pope to Rome, adding that, "as the United States has no longer a diplomatic representative in that city, the presence there of an American cardinal would seem to be most desirable, and it would be of great advantage in many ways." And he concluded the interview from which we quote with these words: "The relation of the cardinal to our government will doubtless be a pleasant one, as respect for the rank is acknowledged by all nations without regard to creed, and if some day we should hear that the President had addressed him as 'my cousin' our people need not be scandalized, for that is the custom."

As the Roman cardinals are princes of the church, and in Europe rank with princes, next after emperors and kings, it is self-evident that, so far as possible, the adherents of the Roman Church will regard their American cardinal as having a place second only to that of the President; and the Baltimore prelate, with a pleasure which he could not conceal, expects him to be addressed by the chief magistrate of this country as "my cousin."

After a review of the strides of Romanism in this country, and of its defiant attitude in relation to the common schools, public charities, penal and reformatory institutions, the Indian policy of the government, and every other question into which the priests can put a wedge, we are more than ever aroused by the consolidation and the aggression which menace us in this "compliment to the nation." It means all that the most ardent papist can wish for the ecclesiastical supremacy of his church in the United States. It means all that Bismarck and Gladstone are contending against in Germany and in Great Britain. It means "Vaticanism" in America under Jesuit rule.

If our Protestant population are dazed with the brilliant color of the cardinal's hat and robes, and cozened with the new "cousin" of our President, it will be their own fault. Dr. McCloskey personally is regarded with the highest respect for his learning and character. As the Archbishop of New York he has been far less demonstrative than his able and ever-aggressive predecessor, Archbishop Hughes, although perhaps not less successful in the administration of his province. As a cardinal he will undoubtedly use all his power in his "relations to our government" to advance the interests of his church. What those "relations" are our people will gradually find out at the polls in successive elections and upon all questions where that church can touch the State.

There is another phase of the subject of an American cardinalate, which is worthy of grave consideration—namely: whether it is becoming or proper for an American citizen to accept such a dignity. Our judicious cotemporary, the Evening Post, has a thoughtful article in review of the matter, which expresses our own views so cogently that we reproduce a portion of it, as follows:

"The constitution expressly provides not only that 'no State shall grant any title of nobility,' but also that 'no title of nobility shall be granted by the United States, and no person holding any office of profit or trust under them shall, without the consent of the Congress, accept of any present, emolument, office or title, of any kind whatever, from any king, prince or foreign State.' The corresponding provision in the Articles of Confederation was more restrictive, and absolutely prohibited the acceptance of office or title from a king, prince or foreign State by any officer of any of the United States. The following amendment, submitted many years ago by Congress as a supplement to the existing provisions of the constitution, is still pending before the States, many of which have ratified it:

"'If any citizen of the United States shall accept, claim, receive or retain any title of nobility or honor, or shall, without the consent of Congress, accept or retain any present, pension, office or emolument of any kind whatever, from any emperor, king, prince or foreign power, such person shall cease to be a citizen of the United States, and shall be incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under them or either of them.'

"The purpose of the existing provisions of the constitution, and of this pending amendment, was to enforce the political equality of all the citizens as an elementary principle of our system of government. Titles of nobility were justly considered by the framers of the constitution to be contrary to the spirit of equality; and we entertain little doubt that, if the creation of an American cardinal had been impending at the time of the submission of the amendment, there would have been less apathy among the State Legislatures in respect to its ratification. If it were fully ratified, the acceptance of his new dignity by the archbishop would involve his surrender of the franchise of an American citizen.

"In these suggestions there is no need of reference to the purely ecclesiastical functions of a cardinal. So far as those are concerned, we shall not now argue that the appointment of a Roman Catholic to be a cardinal is of any more political concern than the election of a Methodist or a Protestant Episcopalian to a bishopric. We need refer solely to the functions and rank of a cardinal as a secular prince. Let the question be tested by a consideration of what would be the relative rank of the American cardinal and the American minister upon the occasion of official secular ceremony in which both of them might be present at the court of Austria or the court of Spain. We are much mistaken if a spectacle would not then be manifest of a precedence of the prelate over the diplomatist which would not be satisfactory to the national pride of the people of the United States.

"These things considered, an occasion for a signal act of patriotism offers itself to Archbishop McCloskey. He has an unprecedented opportunity to vindicate the dignity of an American citizen before the world by a refusal of the red hat and sapphire ring. Let him return to the Pope of Rome the insignia of the proffered title, saying: 'May it please your holiness, I am grateful for your recognition in my person of the growth of the church in the United States, but as a citizen of this republic I cannot accept with propriety an ecclesiastical office to which pertains a rank of secular nobility.'"—Christian Intelligencer.

The Mission of the Fly.

Why are flies? has been a perpetual query with housekeepers and persons who would take noonday naps in hot weather. The question has been answered by Mr. Emerson, an English chemist, whose experiments are recorded in the Scientific American. In the light of the revelations of that gentleman's investigations the fly assumes the position of an important friend instead of a pest to mankind.

Did you ever watch a fly who has just alighted after soaring about the room for some little time? He goes through a series of operations which reminds you of a cat licking herself after a meal, or of a bird pluming its feathers. First, the hind feet are rubbed together, then each hind leg is passed over a wing, then the fore legs undergo a like treatment; and lastly, if you look sharp, you will see the insect carry his proboscis over his legs and about his body as far as he can reach. The minute trunk is perfectly retractile, and it terminates in two large lobes, which you can see spread out when the insect begins a meal on a lump of sugar. Now the rubbing together of legs and wings may be a smoothing operation; but for what purpose is this carefully going over the body with the trunk, especially when that organ is not fitted for licking, but simply for grasping and sucking up food.

Mr. Emerson states that he began his self-appointed task of finding out whether the house fly really serves any appreciable purpose in the scheme of creation, excepting as an indifferent scavenger, by capturing a fine specimen and gluing his wings down to a microscope slide. On placing the slide under the instrument, to the investigator's disgust, the fly appeared covered with lice, causing the offending insect to be promptly released and another substituted in his place. Fly No. 2 was no better off than fly No. 1, and as the same might be predicated of flies 3, 4, 5 (or of n flies, as the algebras have it,) Mr. Emerson concluded that here was something which at once required looking into. Why were the flies lousy? Meanwhile fly No. 2, on the slide, seemed to take his position very coolly, and, extending his proboscis, began to sweep it over his body as if he had just alighted. A glance through the microscope, however, showed that the operation was not one of self-beautification, for wherever the lice were there the trunk went. The lice were disappearing into the trunk; the fly was eating them.

He took the paper into the kitchen and waved it around, taking care that no flies touched it, went back to the microscope and there found animalcules, the same as on flies. He had now arrived at something definite; the animalcules were floating in the air; and the quick motions of the flies gathered them on their bodies, and the flies then went into some quiet corner to have their dainty meal.

The investigator goes on to describe how he continued the experiment in a variety of localities, and how, in dirty and bad-smelling quarters, he found the myriads of flies which existed there literally covered with animalcules, while other flies, captured in bed-rooms, or well-ventilated, clean apartments were miserably lean and entirely free from their prey. Wherever filth existed, evolving germs which might generate disease, there were the flies, covering themselves with the minute organisms and greedily devouring the same.—Methodist.

The German Press and the Papacy.

The encyclical letter of the Pope to the Bishops of Germany has had the effect to arouse the more influential portion of the press of Germany in an unprecedented degree. Nothing could be more outspoken than their comments upon this insolent manifesto, or more hearty than their unqualified condemnation of it. All of them seem to be animated by the principle enunciated by Prince Bismarck, on the sixteenth ultimo, in the Prussian Diet, when he said that "the maxim that more obedience was due to God than to man certainly did not mean that more obedience was due to a Pope misguided by Jesuits than to the State." This distinction between obedience to God and obedience to a fallible Pope, who is the dupe and cat's-paw of the Jesuits, is the key note of the utterances of the German editors, to which they superadd arguments deprecating the mental and civil enslavement which must result from the latter sort of obedience, together with severe attacks upon the German bishops for the pusillanimity and duplicity which they exhibited when considering the dogma of infallibility. On this last subject the language of the German press is very severe and pointed. Thus, the Berlin Provincial Correspondence reminds the German bishops how they first declared against infallibility, then submitted to it, then tried to explain it away, and all this only to be now treated to an undisguised order to rebel against the law of the land. The Munich Neueste Nachrichten, the journal which enjoys the largest circulation in Bavaria, goes the length of giving the German bishops the lie for declaring infallibility an impossible innovation before 1870, and now endeavoring to persuade the moral and manly people of that country that they never did anything of the kind. The Cologne Gazette, summing up, as it were, arrives at the conclusion that no Roman Catholic with an atom of self-respect can, after the Pope's encyclical letter, remain in the service of the State unless openly and avowedly rejecting the revolutionary religion and politics of the holy father. The like view is taken by very many papers.—Christian Intelligencer.

COFFEE MADE OF OLD SHIRTS.—We called attention, not long since, to a recent triumph of science more curious than tempting, viz.: the manufacture of nice table-jelly out of old boots. But science stops at nothing, and now matches its last exploit with another. The Scientific American says:

Some time ago Dr. Vander Weyde, of this city (New York,) regaled some friends not merely with boot-jelly, but with shirt-coffee, and the repast was pronounced by all partakers excellent. The shirt-coffee was sweetened with calf and collar sugar, both coffee and sugar being produced in the same way. The linen (of course after washing) was treated with nitric acid, which, acting on the lignite contained in the fiber, produced glucose or grape sugar. This, roasted, made an excellent imitation of coffee, which an addition of unroasted glucose readily sweetened.

The toad takes off his dotted coat and pantaloons after they get old and dirty, and eats them with a relish. This "old boot and shirt business" looks very much as though the chemists intend that men shall not be outdone in economy even by toads.

THE WAY TO ESCAPE.—I want to say to those who are victims of strong drink that, while there is a point beyond which a man cannot stop in his own strength, the Lord God, by his grace, can help him to stop at any time.

Last summer I was in a room in New York where there were many men who have been reclaimed from drunkenness, I heard their testimony, and for the first time in my life there flashed out a truth I never understood. They said: "We were victims of strong drink. We tried to give it up, but always failed; but somehow, since we gave our hearts to Christ, he has taken care of us." I believe that the time will soon come when the grace of God will show its power here, not only to save man's soul, but his body, and reconstruct, purify, elevate and redeem it.—T. De Witt Talmage.

WHILE the Rev. Mr. Begg, of Abbotshall, was delivering a course of forenoon lectures in Luke, one of his most regular attenders, getting tired of the repeated references to that saint, resolved one Sunday morning to take a spell in the neighboring church of Kirkcaldy, where the Rev. Mark Bryden officiated. On his way thither he was met by an intimate friend, who said to him: "Oh, Sandy, you're surely aff ye're road this morning?" "Oo, ay," was the reply, "I've gotten tired o' St. Luke, an' think to hae a bit screed of St. Mark for a change." "Very weel, Sandy," replied his friend, "though it canna be said that ye're lukewarm, it's evidently a case of backsliding to gang frae Luke to Mark."

YOU can see them any day in the streets of any town—men who look damaged. Men, too, of good original material, who started out in life with generous sentiments and some generous aspirations. Once it was said they were bright, promising lads; once they looked happily into the faces of mothers, whose daily breath was a prayer for their purity and peace. Ah, God! what if some of them have vowed their souls away to confiding wives, who silently wonder what can be the meaning of this change—the cold, slow-creeping shadow—that—is—coming over the home and heart! What if some of them shrink from the touch of their own babies, as if innocence had nothing for them but rebuke! Going to the bad! The spell of evil companionship; the willingness to hold and use money not honestly gained; the stealthy, seductive, plausible advance of the appetite for strong drink; the treacherous fascinations of the gaming-table; the gradual loss of interest in business and in things which build a man up; the rapid weakening of all noble purposes; the decay of manliness; the recklessness and blasphemy against fate; the sullen despair of ever breaking the chains of evil habit—what victories of shame and contempt, what harvests of hell have grown such seeds as these. Sneer, if you will, like a fool, at the suggestions of reform, morals, religion; every man knows in his better moods—and every man has better moods—that all there is of true life is personal virtue and rectitude of character. Going to the bad! But there is hope. Earth and heaven are full of hands ever reaching to help the lost man back to the better way. All the good there is in the universe is in full sympathy with that little goodness which inwardly reproves and protests.—Rev. Charles G. Ames.

HOW CHICKENS GET OUT OF SHELLS.—Take an egg out of a nest on which the hen has set her full time, carefully holding it to the ear; turning it around you will find the exact spot on which the little fellow is picking on the inside of the shell; this he will do until the inside skin is perforated, and then the shell is forced outward as a small scab, leaving a hole. Now, if you will take one of the eggs in this condition from under the hen, remove it to the house or other suitable place, put it in a box or nest, keeping it warm and moist, as near the temperature of the hen as possible (which may be done by laying it between two bottles of warm water upon some cotton or wool,) and lay a glass over the box or nest, then you can sit or stand, as is most convenient, and witness the true modus operandi. Now watch the little fellow work its way into the world, and you will be amused and instructed, as I have often been. After it has got its opening it commences a nibbling motion with the point of the upper bill on the outside of the shell, always working to the right (if you have the large end of the egg from you and the hole upward,) until it has worked its way almost around, say within one-half an inch, in a perfect circle; it then forces the cap or butt end of the shell off, and then has a chance to straighten its neck, thereby loosening its legs somewhat, and so, by their help, forcing the body from the shell.—American Farm Journal.

THE papists overshot their mark, says the Watchman and Reflector, when they labored so assiduously to prevent Rev. Mr. Wall, the English Baptist missionary, from getting a foothold in Rome, driving his mission from house to house, and making it almost impossible for him to rent even a residence. As a consequence, being shut up to purchasing a place, and adapting it to his purpose, a wealthy Baptist of England came forward, and at his own cost bought a house in a location admirably suited to be a center of operations, and passed it over to Mr. Wall. A chapel has been erected, schoolrooms have been prepared, and many other alterations made, and the chapel was to be dedicated March 21, at which time it was expected that many English Baptists would be present to participate in the exercises. Mr. Thomas Cooke, well known as a coordinator of travelers, offers, at a charge high enough simply to reimburse him, to conduct a party—say fifty or a hundred—of Baptist pastors to Rome, giving them a week in the Eternal City, and a day or two each in Paris, Turin, Milan, Venice and Florence, and accomplishing the whole tour and return in twenty days. This is a pilgrimage of which we shall be glad to hear more. One thing is certain, the Roman Baptist mission has become a fixed fact thanks to the papal priests.

A CANINE PROTECTOR.—A writer in the London Figaro says: "I am a marine engineer, and during one of my Mediterranean trips I brought home a canary, a perfect gem of a whistler, who warbles from early morn to dewy eve. I have also a Scotch terrier dog called Pepper, and a cat dignified by the name of Tom. Since the addition of the canary to my household Tom had cast many a longing, lingering look at him, which boded no good, and aroused serious apprehensions for the warbler's safety. About a fortnight ago, and as is my custom in the morning, I went to the kitchen where the cage hangs, when, to my horror, I found the cage empty, the door of it, which was never perfectly secured, being open. The canary was not visible, but Tom was seated on the dresser in an excited-looking state, as if he had done the deed, of which no trace was observable. On looking, fancy my astonishment and joy at beholding Pepper lying on all-fours, with his mouth gently covering the canary with just sufficient resistance to keep it from fluttering off, while his eyes were fixed with intensity on every motion made by Tom. Such sagacity on the part of the terrier was touching in the extreme, and the satisfaction with which he yielded up to me his feathery charge spoke volumes."

Religious Intelligence.

A WOMAN'S Board of Missions of the Disciples of Christ has been organized.

BISHOP JANES has dedicated more than one hundred Methodist Episcopal churches in the State of New Jersey.

THE Baptists in Poland have increased, in five years, from 312 to 1,162. The mission-field extends over 400 miles.

THE Emperor of Russia has given permission to the London Society for Promoting the Spread of Christianity Among the Jews to reopen its work in the empire. This society has been excluded from Russia since the commencement of the Crimean war.

BISHOP GONAT has lately consecrated the new Arabic Protestant church in Jerusalem, it being the third Protestant church in that city. The other two are Christ church, on Mount Zion, and the German chapel, on the Place of the Knights of St. John.

THE Protestant Episcopal Almanac for 1875 gives 50 bishops, 5 bishops elect, 3,085 priests and deacons, 3,140 clergymen, 2,750 parishes, 273,092 communicants, 23,097 Sunday school teachers, 225,733 Sunday school scholars, and contributions during the year $6,851,083.27.

IT NOW seems probable that the next meeting of the Evangelical Alliance will be held in Edinburg. The religious fermentation in Germany and Switzerland is so great that it hardly seems wise to have the meeting there. Rome and Jerusalem do not yet seem to be ready.

THE Pall Mall Gazette's correspondent at Berlin reports that the German government has received a memorial from the Protestant clergy of Spain complaining that liberty of worship is threatened. Similar memorials have been forwarded to other Protestant powers in Europe and to the United States.

THE English Congregationalists have 3,276 churches and 3,116 ministers. They spent last year in various forms of missionary works £141,090. They have gained in ten years 508 churches. One thousand preaching and evangelistic stations in England and Wales are not counted among the churches and should be added.

LOS ANGELES, CALIFORNIA.—The Presbyterian church at Los Angeles, California, was organized January 11, 1874, and one year later the number of members was fifty-one. This church is of special interest to us, as it is composed partly of sons and daughters of our churches in Georgia and Alabama.—Central Presbyterian.

BESIDES Archbishops McCloskey and Ledochowski, Archbishops Manning, of Westminster, and Deschamps, of Malines, and Monsignori Giannelli and Bartolini were created cardinals March 15. The changes which we have mentioned as being contemplated in American Roman Catholic dioceses were also made at the same time.

THE latest dispatch from London, March 15, says: "Immense crowds continue to attend the revival meetings held by the Rev. Messrs. Moody and Sankey. To-night over twenty thousand people were present, and thousands were turned away. The streets in the vicinity of the hall were choked with people unable to obtain admission."

THERE is said to be an unusual interest excited in Putnam, Connecticut, over the conversion to Protestantism of a number of French Canadian Romanists employed in the factories there. The Congregational pastor of the town reports that some fifty or sixty have left the Catholic Church. Father Chiniquy has visited the place twice, his words and influence having had a sensible effect on each occasion.

THE Roman Catholics, despite the low level of Christian attainment among their converts, numerically form an important factor in the mission work of India. In 1865 they numbered 785,000 members, and two years later the figure was set at 802,000. Although these figures cannot be entirely relied on, as many dying children, for instance, are included in the lists, nevertheless the actual total must be very large.

THE new Presbyterian work at Chi-nui, China, continues to prosper. A native pastor has been appointed over the three churches now organized among the converts from the Nameless Sect. Mr. Corbett, on a recent trip, baptized seventeen adults. The government prevents an outburst of persecution; but the hostility manifested against the "foreign" religion is intense, and shows itself in the social and business relations of the converts. Marriages are broken off and work is refused to those who will not labor on the Sabbath.

IN THE United States and England, with its dependencies and missions, there are 31 Congregational colleges, with 1,224 students; of churches, including preaching and evangelistic stations, there are 7,113. Altogether there are 10,000 sources from whence gospel light irradiates. The total number of ministers of the denomination in the two countries is 6,351. The total expenditure of the denomination, not counting contributions to Bible societies and kindred organizations, is over $8,000,000 per year.

MUSURUS PACHA, the Turkish ambassador to London, has addressed a letter to Mr. Kinnaird, explaining the refusal of the Turkish government to grant the delegates of the Evangelical Alliance an audience with the Sultan. He had already warned the members that such a novelty as an audience could not be thought of, and had assured them that complete freedom of conscience existed throughout the Turkish empire, by the operation of the Hatt-i-Humayun of 1855, which was still in force. Finally he said: "In fact, is it possible that the Sultan, who is considered by the Mussulman people as the caliph or vicar of the prophet, should receive a deputation charged to solicit that severe and peremptory orders should be issued to abstain henceforth from raising any difficulty in the conversion of Mussulmans to Christianity? I leave you to appreciate what an impression this would have produced on the minds of the Mussulman people."

REV. JAMES H. WILBUR, or Father Wilbur, who was sent to Oregon as Indian missionary by the Missionary Board of the Methodist Episcopal Church, has been giving a report of his work to the government at Washington, he having been Indian agent for the government on a tract of land of an area of forty by sixty miles in Washington Territory for the last ten years. He has 3,500 Indians taken from the "war path" on this tract whom he has brought into such a state of civilization that they now have 8,000 acres of cultivated land, 500 Christian worshipers, more than 200 comfortable homes, and two neat churches. He insists that a peace policy and protection from bad men will everywhere make the Indian as good as a white man.

DR. MOFFAT ON DR. LIVINGSTONE. More than thirty-two years ago he (Dr. Moffat) came down to Cape Town from the interior, where he had been laboring for twenty-three years, for the purpose of getting the New Testament printed in the native language. This he found he could not get accomplished, for there were no printing offices in Cape Town that would undertake the work. Acting upon the advice of the Governor, Sir George Napier, he came to London, where he found Livingstone preparing to leave England for China on a missionary enterprise. Livingstone got hold of some of his speeches and pamphlets, and at once resolved to go to Africa. Dr. Moffat said that, being Livingstone's father-in-law, he had constant intercourse with him, and had always found him to have but one object in view—to serve Africa.

LEGAL STATUS OF THE OLD CATHOLICS.—The Independence Belge says: "The commission of the Cisleithan Reichsrath for confessional affairs is animated with the best intentions for regulating the Old Catholic question in a liberal manner. It has elaborated a plan which would put Old Catholic congregations on the same footing with those of Roman Catholics. But the minister of worship, who has already difficulty enough in keeping the opposition of the bishops within reasonable bounds, has not cared to provoke the tempest which an attempt to carry into effect the parliamentary proposition would certainly make. He will not, therefore, accept the plan of the commission, and refuses to recognize an equality of condition between the Old Catholics and the Roman Catholics. All that he will agree to is that the Old Catholics may organize themselves into a separate religious society. But this naturally excludes them from many prerogatives and immunities, as also from a share in the property, ecclesiastical buildings, cemeteries and schools, which, according to the minister of worship, are the indienable possession of the Romish clergy. On such grounds as he holds, an understanding is impossible between the government and the parliamentary majority. From such a state of affairs to a conflict is but a short step, and a conflict there is likely to be on the first occasion."

THE Old Catholic movement in Europe appears to keep its vitality, and in Switzerland its advocates evidently do not intend to spend all their strength in declaiming against Ultramontanism. In Berne, which is the political capital of the cantons, on the eleventh of December, the faculty of Old Catholic Theology had its formal inauguration with a memorable union of intellectual and festive celebration. The dignitaries of government, education and religion joined in the exercises, and the banquet and the torchlight procession in the evening brought the social elements into play. The old people said that never had there been such a time among the scholars; and now it remains to be seen how much solid encouragement the five professors then inaugurated will have in their work. They are men of conspicuous ability as well as learning, with Friedrich and Herzog at their head, and with nine students to begin with. So far as organized theological instruction is concerned, Switzerland takes the lead of Germany in this direction, and Berne is ahead of Bonn. It is worthy of note that the Rev. John Reykamp, nephew of the late Bishop of Deventer, has been elected Archbishop of Utrecht in place of Archbishop Loos, who died last June, and thus the Jansenist branch of the Old Catholic movement is continued.

BAPTISTS AND METHODISTS.—The New York Christian Advocate says: The Baptist statistics for 1874 show the large summary for the United States of 487 associations, 21,510 churches, 13,351 ministers and 1,761,171 church members. The gain over the previous year is very large—namely: fifty-three associations, 930 churches, 756 ministers and 127,632 members. Our Baptist friends include in their returns those from all the Baptist churches, North and South, though it is well known that the two sections have no connectional denominational bond. If the Methodist Episcopal statistics of the United States were reported after that same method, the figures would be swelled to much greater proportions. Thus, the two leading branches of the Methodist Church (Methodist Episcopal Church and Methodist Episcopal Church, South) would return for the year 1874, 14,216 itinerant preachers, 18,050 local preachers and 2,231,406 members. If we add to these the returns of the colored Methodist Episcopal churches, and the other branches which agree with us not only in doctrine and usages, but also in church government, the figures would stand thus: Itinerant ministers, 17,749; local preachers, 22,367; lay members, 2,875,988. We have not included the returns of the Methodist Church, the Methodist Protestant Church, the American Wesleyans, Free Methodists and Primitive Methodists of the United States. Adding these, we have a grand total for the United States of 19,150 itinerant preachers, 24,512 local preachers (a total of 43,662 preachers) and 3,461,988 lay members.

CHANGE OF RATES.

In conformity with an agreement between the several papers published in the interest of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, the subscription price of the ADVOCATE, including postage, will hereafter be as follows, viz:

One year..... $2 50
Six months..... 1 50
Three months..... 80

THE SUBSCRIPTION PRICE of the ADVOCATE is One Dollar and a Quarter per year to ministers of the gospel, and the same to the widows of deceased itinerant preachers. Where bills have been sent charging them more than that amount it was owing to the fact that they were not known as such to the book-keeper, and if they will inform us the accounts will be corrected. Should they have already paid we will credit the amount overpaid on subscription, or dispose of it as they may order.

LOOK OUT FOR ACKNOWLEDGMENTS.—Subscribers and other persons writing to us should look in the letter list for the acknowledgment of their letters. The letters which reach us on or before Saturday of each week are acknowledged in the issue of the following Thursday.

Rev. John Wilkinson.

The death of this able and beloved minister is a sad bereavement to our church. The announcement will be heard with peculiar sorrow by the people of Louisiana, and by his many friends in New Orleans. He was one of the most eloquent, spiritual and finished preachers in our connection. In the prime of his manhood, and growing in all the elements of greatness and eminence we had expected for him a long, brilliant and useful career. But he has been called away almost before his sun had reached the meridian. Although self-educated, he was well educated, and a hard student up to the time of his death. He had a mind of rare poise and balance, logical, analytical, and broad of view, in connection with an imagination which moved with ease amidst the regions of the beautiful and the sublime. Clear, strong and acute in metaphysical speculations and in argumentative statement, he possessed descriptive powers of the very highest order, and his sermons usually exhibited all of these qualities in their greatest perfection. Naturally endowed with a voice of singular sweetness and compass, and with a person of manly proportions and graceful address, he had reached the highest excellence in speaking. His manner and elocution were in harmony with the matter of his sermons—the fitting frame of a noble picture. But in the presence of so many elements of greatness his spirituality and absorbing devotion to Christ overshadowed all. There was a saintliness, a purity, a consecration of purpose and a simplicity that impressed all who knew him. While his gifts commanded universal admiration and respect, his ardent piety secured the unbounded confidence and love of all classes of people. Bro. Wilkinson's history has for us its lessons. He was a child of Methodism, and his character and ministry were the product of our system. No school or seminary ever turned out a more effective or finished minister of the gospel. His life was one of superior usefulness and interest; his death was a translation; but there is a single but impressive warning connected with his premature end. He worked too hard, studied late, very late at night, and we fear fell a victim to an unselfish but intemperate zeal in the labor to which he was divinely called. The vital powers were not well and generously nourished, the brain was overtaxed, the nervous system was enfeebled, and when the attack came there was not strength to meet it.

For a sketch of Bro. Wilkinson our readers are referred to an article from Rev. Dr. Walker in another column.

The Worry of the World.

It is said that the greatest mortality among men from forty-five years and upward occurs during times of great financial trouble. The managers of life insurance companies have long since learned this to be a fact. The prevailing atmospheric condition, the season of the year, the existence of epidemic disease, are inconsequential in comparison with the pulse of trade and the business condition of the country. It is not the malaria, the cold or heat that kills. During the past year suicide has been alarmingly prevalent all over the country. This also coincides with the stagnation of business, the general shrinkage in values and the terrible pecuniary stringency. The hard times have killed thousands and driven hundreds to self-destruction. The sorrow of the world in this respect works death.

The burden of anxiety resting upon people, in connection with their struggle for a living, is the most universal of all. No other interest occupies so much of time or of thought, and no other brings so much of disquiet and distress of mind. There is comparatively little suffering in this country from absolute destitution. Those who actually starve or die for want of clothing and shelter are comparatively few. Ordinarily it can hardly be that any should perish in a civilized land, where abundance of the necessaries of life is waiting for consumers. It is the mental suffering that makes up the greater sum of misery. The loss of property, the humiliation of poverty and disappointment in the plans and prospects of business are the ingredients of a cup more bitter than extreme physical destitution. It would seem to be a part of the appointed discipline of the human race that we should be subject to toil, and that our wants should be supplied only by wearying and exhausting effort. The higher the civilization, intelligence and refinement, the more keenly are the arrows of misfortune felt. The wants created by society, by cultivated tastes, and by habits of dependence, though somewhat apart from the physical needs, are scarcely less imperative. It is a part of our schooling, doubtless, that we should eat bread in the sweat of our faces, and that the conditions of a comfortable support should usually call out the activities and energies of mind and body. In a sinful world the necessity of industry and labor is a beneficent appointment.

If this inexorable demand were not upon the world, it is hardly conceivable to what extent of riot and mischief people would go. Both death and labor are important elements in our probation, and both contribute to secure the moral end. They are related to sin, but mercifully connected with the means by which sin is to be overcome. The masses have little discipline of mind or development of their powers beyond that which is obtained in winning bread and providing for their physical wants. The stern necessity keeps down the gratification of evil propensities, and absorbs the time and strength which would be perverted to the indulgence of vicious inclinations. The uncertainties of our temporal supplies, the precarious nature of them, and our dependence upon Providence for all, are calculated to lead to faith and gratitude. There is a divinely beneficent purpose in the struggle for food and raiment, and the attendant sufferings are more than compensated by the moral ends which they subserve. Many of the ills of life and of the sufferings attendant upon providing for our necessities are from ourselves; but at best we suppose there is and always will be occasion for apprehension, and no inconsiderable amount of grief and pain. Every business has its peculiar troubles. Men are apt to regard their own calling as most trying and most prolific of annoyances. Each one knows where his own shoe pinches, but they all pinch somewhere. It is not given to many to make a living easily and without trial of patience. It is a sore travail under the sun to which we are subjected. It is the lot of man, and best for him as things are.

But must there be this killing worry? Religion comes to us as the antidote. Christ tells us to take no thought for food and raiment, or for the morrow. We suppose thought means worry. Let us be patient and submissive under the yoke of this severe discipline, and trust in the heavenly Father. Christ will not take away the burden perhaps, but he will help us to bear it. Sufferings are inevitable, but the believing soul shall have rest and peace. These every-day trials are the very best for the perfecting of patience, and there is a real dignity and beauty in them when we consider that they are working out for us an eternal weight of glory. They are doing us good if we are meanwhile looking at the things which are not seen. What we call the failures in this life are really our greatest successes if they minister to the glory that shall be revealed. It is not strange that men who reject the gospel should be driven to suicide and premature death by the worry of the world. This world, as an end in itself, is a poor affair, and the wonder is that those who have no right conception of its relation to the future life do not more generally "shuffle off this mortal coil." To make life tolerable we must feel that its vexations and pains are elements of inestimable value, and that we may be living to the most purpose when we are suffering most. The ups and downs of the world, the life-long conflict with want and toil, are for our discipline, and for the trial and purification of our faith. Grace delivers from worry by lifting the soul above it, and by revealing the blessed uses of adversity.

It is not God's design that we should be satisfied with the present life. It is doubtless a good world for its purpose—to be the school and probation of immortal beings—but everything in it points to some other and better goal. The troubles of it, the "vanity of vanities" which the most of us find it to be sooner or later, the turmoil and anxiety which belong to it, all bespeak its transient and probationary character. Tired we may be of life, even as Job was, but the most weary believer will accept the patriarch's determination: "All the days of my appointed time will I wait till my change come." The world may go hardly with him, but the Christian will not fret and worry about it. He will dwell in God's secret place and abide under his shadow. Trouble may help to wean his thoughts and affections from earth, and to intensify his longing for heaven, but it will not drive him to self-destruction, nor to a spirit of rebellion and despair.

Rev. John Wilkinson.

Many will be the pleasant memories and mournful regrets which this honored and lamented name will recall. Bro. Wilkinson was born in Parsonstown, Kings county, Ireland, August 17, 1834, and died in Baton Rouge, Louisiana, April 7, 1875. He was blessed with pious parents, and trained up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. Alone and an entire stranger, he arrived in New Orleans just twenty-one years ago this month, being not quite twenty-one years of age. He immediately found employment in his occupation as a printer. He promptly presented to the writer, then pastor of the Carondelet Street church, his certificate of membership, and entered at once into the privileges and useful activities of the church. He also identified himself with the Young Men's Christian Association, and became a useful worker. He was married to Miss Lizzie Kent, August —, 1859, by Rev. Joshua Heard. For some time before the war he was foreman of the NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE office. On the outbreak of the war his sympathies were with the people of the South, and he entered service in an artillery company raised in Copiah county, Mississippi. He was in the long and severe siege of Port Hudson, where he met great perils, and endured great privation and suffering. On the fall of that post he was paroled. After the expiration of his parole he went into service in the cavalry. A vacancy occurring, he was elected by his comrades their captain. He was then detailed for the protection of the country back of Vicksburg and along the western boundary of middle Mississippi. As a soldier he was brave, faithful and pure. As an officer he was impartial and diligent, winning the respect and love of all in his command.

At the close of the great struggle he returned to New Orleans. The writer being again pastor of Carondelet—though our church edifices were then held by the Methodist Episcopal Church (North)—we organized in the Unitarian church, kindly loaned us. Bro. Wilkinson was considered the most suitable man, and was appointed superintendent of the Sabbath school, a position he filled with eminent ability, satisfaction and usefulness. He also resumed his place as foreman in our ADVOCATE office on the resumption of its publication. He was an accomplished artist as a printer, and filled the place of foreman with great efficiency.

He felt that he was called of God and moved by the Holy Ghost to take on him the office and work of the ministry, and began to study for his future work with untiring diligence. He was recommended to the Quarterly Conference for license to preach, and was unanimously elected. Bro. Wilkinson was one of those who had the hearty outward call of the church as well as the inward call of God to the office of the ministry. All seemed to recognize his eminent fitness for the sacred work. The Louisiana Conference, with equal unanimity, received him, and he was appointed to Opelousas, which station he filled three years with ever-increasing usefulness and acceptability. At the close of his third year, while at Shreveport attending the session of the Annual Conference, his beloved and faithful wife was taken from him and his four motherless children. At the close of this Conference Bishop McTyeire read out the name of John Wilkinson for Shreveport. There seemed to be a murmur of applause all over the Conference floor. All seemed to feel and confess the eminent adaptation of the man for the place. He spent four years in Shreveport—years of intense study, pastoral labor, and ever-increasing acceptability as a preacher. In 1871 (May 1) he was married to Miss Mollie Keener, daughter of Bishop Keener, with whom he lived nearly four happy years in the unalloyed bliss of wedded love.

The last year of his pastorate in Shreveport that city was visited with epidemic yellow fever, which for virulence and mortality was scarcely ever surpassed in the history of plagues and pestilences. While hundreds of all classes fled or fell, Bro. Wilkinson, with the same undaunted courage with which he had faced death upon the battle-field, faced the pestilence that walketh in darkness, and wasteth at noonday, until his exhausted strength succumbed to deadly miasm. But he was raised up, and when but feeble went forth again on his errands of mercy, nursing, comforting, counseling and providing. Many there will rise up and call him blessed. Had not the itinerant law removed him at the end of four years, the loving hands of the people of Shreveport would have held him until now. Bro. Wilkinson's next and last field of labor was Baton Rouge. Here he was the same blameless Christian, diligent student, faithful pastor, son of consolation and popular preacher that he had been; only all this was intensified by constant growth in every spiritual, social and ministerial excellence.

Bro. Wilkinson was gifted far above the average—his natural endowments were diligently and successfully cultivated. As an English scholar he had no superior among us in thoroughness, accuracy and polish. He was also diligently prosecuting linguistic studies. In his pulpit preparations he was accurate and complete. The oil that he used in the sanctuary was well beaten. As a preacher he was clear, instructive, spiritual and impressive. He had superior elocutionary gifts, and used them with happy effect. He was a delightful companion. He had almost a feminine modesty and refinement. His esthetic tastes were exquisite; he reveled in the love of the beautiful. I have never known a man of more singleness of aim or saintliness of character. He recently preached a most impressive sermon on the resurrection. His bereaved wife says his talk of late had an increasing spirituality and heavenliness. His last earthly work was to write an address to be delivered to a thousand children in Carondelet Street church, New Orleans, at the District Conference, and the theme was: "I want to be an Angel." How soon he realized that wish! Did not these early buds and songs indicate that the vernal glories of immortality were near? He came from his study, after writing this address, exhausted, took his bed and never left it more. He was attacked with pneumonia, terminating on the brain. His talk was heavenly and beautiful. While in a state of semi-delirium he was in delightful fellowship with angels, the theme of his address still floating like a beautiful vision before his mental eye.

His sickness and death produced a profound impression on the people of Baton Rouge. The church, at his funeral, was draped in sable and adorned with flowers, and crowded with representatives of all classes, who wept and sobbed in sympathy with the solemn scene. A large concourse escorted his body to the grave, which was covered with beautiful wreaths and a white rose cross. The Sabbath school children wept, sobbed, and sang "The Beautiful River," "I want to be an Angel," and "Over There, Over There." His address was brought to New Orleans, and read at the time and place to the audience for whom it was prepared. The solemn attention and the tears of many evinced the depth and tenderness of their love.

Bro. Wilkinson had a bright earthly future. Had he lived he would have attained great eminence and honor. We can ill spare him; but the Lord had need of him. His will be done. May his benediction and comfort rest upon the bereaved.

J. B. WALKER.

New Orleans District Conference.

This body met at the Carondelet Street church, New Orleans, on Thursday, at five o'clock P. M. Bishop Paine reached the city on Thursday afternoon, but did not appear in the chair until Friday. The business was concluded on Saturday night, and, after an edifying talk by the Bishop, the minutes were read and the District Conference adjourned. The condition of the churches in the district was pretty thoroughly examined into, revealing a tolerable degree of spiritual prosperity. Accessions were reported in nearly all the charges thus far this year, and the church buildings are mostly in good repair and out of debt. The Sunday school interest engaged the time and attention of the Conference more perhaps than any one other subject, and an excellent report prepared by a special committee was adopted. Apart from the saddening effect of the death of Bro. John Wilkinson, the session was a pleasant and profitable one. The district love-feast on Friday night was one of the best meetings of the kind that we have ever attended. The spacious basement was filled, and the divine presence was manifest in the hearty singing and the prompt and earnest speaking. The next District Conference is to be held at the Felicity Street church. The following delegates and reserves to the Annual Conference were elected: Delegates—W. H. Foster, S. K. Russ, R. M. Walmsley, W. H. N. Magruder. Reserves—R. L. Robertson, Philip Hallaran, Dr. J. J. Lyons, R. S. Rickey.

The last act of the District Conference was the adoption of the following resolution by a rising vote:

Resolved, That it is with profound sorrow that we have heard of the death of our beloved brother, Rev. John Wilkinson, pastor of the church at Baton Rouge, and that we tender to the bereaved family our sympathy and prayers in their affliction.

Sunday School Anniversary.

The anniversary of our district Sunday schools took place at the Carondelet Street church on Sunday, the eleventh instant, at four P. M. The house was full, and the exercises were of a most interesting and impressive character. The singing, under the direction of Prof. J. W. Beardslee, was very sweet and delightful. The presence of the German schools and their singing in German added greatly to the interest of the occasion. The first address was by Rev. J. B. A. Ahrens, on "Reverence for the Aged." It was very happy in all respects, and well appreciated by all. It possessed the novelty of having some passages rendered in German. Bishop Paine declined an extended speech, but made a few remarks.

The last address was that which Bro. Wilkinson had prepared, and the last work that he did in this world. It was read from the manuscript by Dr. Walker, just as it was left by its lamented author, and the impression upon the vast throng was most profound. The address was about the angels, their character and work, and of the angelic dignity and destiny of the redeemed. It was a finished and beautiful production, rich in illustration, and adapted to the occasion. It was a voice not so much from the grave as from the sky, and as the reading went on we could but think of the writer as crowned and mingling in the seraphic company which had occupied his last thoughts on earth. The address closed with the request that the children should sing the familiar song, "I want to be an angel," and when the reading was finished the schools rose and sang it with a pathos that melted all hearts. It was the house of God and the gate of heaven indeed. The heavenly world never seemed nearer, nor the communion with the blessed and glorified more intimate and complete.

After another song about "The Bright Forever," the benediction was pronounced, and the congregation slowly and quietly dispersed, the chorus of the last song still vibrating and lingering in the air:

> On the banks beyond the river
> We shall meet no more to sever,
> In the bright, the bright forever,
> In the summer land of song.

DEATH OF REV. J. SCAIFE.—The following note from Bro. Bounds brings us intelligence of the death of this venerable minister:

EUFAULA, ALA., April 5, 1875.

Dear Doctor: To-day we buried Bro. J. Scaife, a superannuated member of the Alabama Conference. He was residing at Camilla, Georgia, at which place he died on the fifth instant, in the sixty-fifth year of his age. I have no particulars of his last sickness, only that he was taken sick on the Wednesday previous, had only a few lucid intervals, and died on Monday.

Yours in Christ,

E. M. BOUNDS.

HE never yet put out a dim candle that was lighted at the Sun of Righteousness.—Charnock.

A Secular Press View.

The London Telegraph has this to say about the work of Moody and Sankey:

What are these people whom America has sent over to Ireland, and Ireland to Liverpool, with the astonishing result that wherever they come vast public edifices are filled to the skylights and corners to hear them, the theaters are deserted, the gin shops emptied, the streets are depopulated, the very natures and habits of a work-a-day world seized and transformed by them into "something new and strange?" At Dublin two clowns in an amphitheater attempted to make fun of them. "I feel Moody," said one spangled and painted buffoon; and the other responded: "I feel very Sankey-monious." This sort of wit was wont to stir the groundlings; but, though Cardinal Cullen had solemnly anathematized the wandering pair, and all that was "finleel" about the four courts sneered at them, that Irish audience actually rose and hissed the two facetious fools out of the ring. What, then, we ask anew, are these remarkable persons against whom even Pat, having once heard them, will not allow any rude jokes to be cut? who go from town to town finding no public building big enough for their immense "houses," and who have already engaged in London the Agricultural Hall, and her majesty's Opera House, in the Haymarket, by way of giving east and west, in the metropolis, an equal chance to attend their entertainments? But it is no entertainment at all. It is a business apparently as earnest as death, and as serious as eternity, which brings these two transatlantic missionaries among us; for missionaries they are, and the sole and only "properties" with which they conduct their performances are a Bible and a book of hymns. Armed with these commonplace aids, Moody and Sankey have achieved already such a pilgrimage of popularity that its success might turn a prima donna pale and break the heart of the brightest dramatic star with envy. Moody, it appears, is "mighty in the word;" with a voice of prodigious power, but full of soft and persuasive tones, he flings abroad the thunderbolts of his gospel; and afterward soothes the affrighted and despairing hearts which this searching eloquence has stricken. Sankey is a "chief musician;" he commands in strange perfection, it is said, the fine art of singing successfully pious hilts, songs of Zion. None of your humdrum, old-accustomed hundredth psalms, which drone a rural congregation into sleepiness in preparation for the afternoon sermon, but rousing ballads of righteousness, fervid and flowing outbursts of religious rapture, where words that stir like the voice of a trumpet caught from the battle-field and the camp are set to tunes that flood the common heart with tidal waves of rhythm, and set the inner spirit throbbing. Unassisted, except by what they would themselves call "the sword of the Spirit" and the "harp of the Lord," this orator and this melodist, simple persons both, go together from city to city, meeting with scorn and depreciation when they come, but leaving behind them respect, surprise, new thoughts, and whole communities stirred to the quick, and the police say actually altered for the better in habits and morals.

THE visit of Bishop Paine to New Orleans was a great gratification to our people. He preached to a large congregation at the Carondelet Street church on Sunday morning, and was present at the Sunday school gathering in the afternoon. He left us for his home in Aberdeen, Mississippi, on Monday morning, the twelfth instant. The Bishop preaches with remarkable clearness and power, but he is really in very infirm health, and was a great sufferer while here from a chronic complaint. He was looking not so well as when we parted with him three months ago. He should by all means have rest, and we trust that the brethren will be considerate in their demands upon his time and strength. If the Bishop will take our advice he will give himself but little trouble with District Conferences during the balance of the year, and he will stay at home and take care of his health and life. To have his presence in our churches and Conferences is a great privilege, but he owes it to himself and to the church at large that he should decline laborious and extended trips.

THE REVIVAL IN SAN FRANCISCO. The revival meetings under Mr. Hammond's management continue with increasing interest. Meetings have been held during the week at Pacific Hall and the Young Men's Christian Association Hall during the entire day. Mr. Hammond has essayed to preach on California street to large crowds, and has received great attention. He has also, with a number of ladies and gentlemen, visited houses of ill fame on Dupont street, and in every instance they were treated with such respectful attention as to encourage the movement. While there is doubtless something to regret in the manner of this great awakening, yet there is so much over which Christians should feel thankful that regrets and differences of opinion should be withheld. The whole community of our city finds in this revival more absorbing interest than even in the discussion of stocks. Little knots of men can be seen everywhere discussing Scripture doctrines, affirming or denying. We are sure that good must come with such awakened interest.—Pacific Methodist, March 26.

ATTENTION is called to the notice of the trustees of Seashore camp ground, which will be found on the eighth page of the ADVOCATE.

Books and Periodicals.

THE YOUNG HOUSEWIFE'S COUNSELOR AND FRIEND. By Mrs. Mary Mason. New York: E. J. Hale & Son, 1875.

Our home critic says this is an excellent work. It is very comprehensive, containing directions in every department of housekeeping, including the duties of wife and mother. It is a cook-book, and much more, as it tells about gardening, the dairy, laundry, poultry, nursery, sick-room and home.

OUR Nashville Sunday school periodicals for May have been received. The Magazine is the best publication of its kind that we know of. Every superintendent and teacher in our schools should have it and study it well. The leading article in this number is on the Capabilities of the Sunday School, by Rev. J. C. Granbery, D. D.

THE Methodist Quarterly Review for April, 1875, has the following table of contents: Ralph Waldo Emerson, The First Year of Our Mexican Mission, Egypt and the Pentateuch, Protestantism and Romanism Contrasted, Motley and the Netherlands, Missionary Conferences, Passage of Israel Through the Red Sea, Synopsis of the Quarterlies, Foreign Religious Intelligence, Foreign Literary Intelligence, Quarterly Book-Table.

THE BAPTIST QUARTERLY FOR APRIL, 1875.—This able periodical is issued by the American Baptist Publication Society, Philadelphia. The present number is a very superior one. Contents: Present State of the Baptismal Controversy, The Philosophy of Evolution, Charter of Brown University, Sibboleth, The Vatican Council and Civil Allegiance, The Native Language of Palestine, The Puritan Exodus, Dean Alford, Notices of Books.

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE of April 3 has: Life at High Pressure, Alice Lorraine, Early Kings of Norway, Miss Angel, The Siege of Florence, German Home Life, The Birth of a Republic, besides poetry, short articles and miscellany. The Living Age is among the most valuable literary publications of the day. Littell & Gay, publishers, Boston. Price, $8 a year.

THE Gospel Singer is the title of a new Sunday school song-book by Philip Phillips. Lee & Walker, publishers, Philadelphia. It is exquisitely printed, and contains a great number of the most popular hymns and songs, with the music.

MORTON'S MONTHLY HOME AND SCHOOL for April has: Ants—Their Social and Political Life; Philology in the Nursery; The Phosphorescent Sea; Oliver Goldsmith; How to Pronounce Latin, and other articles.

WARE'S VALLEY MONTHLY is the title of a new periodical to be issued about the middle of April, in St. Louis. Ware & Co., publishers; William M. Leftwich, editor. Price, $3.25 per annum.

THE Texas Farm and Home is published by J. W. Billington & Co., Calvert, Texas. It is a well-conducted monthly, devoted to agriculture. We have received the number for February.

THE Gardeners' Monthly for April contains the usual amount of useful information for gardeners, fruit-growers and florists. Published by Chas. H. Marot, Philadelphia, at $2.00 per year.

THE Journal of Agriculture is published in St. Louis. Price, $1 a year. It is a very handsomely printed monthly, and well edited. We have received the April number.

PETERSON'S NATIONAL MAGAZINE for April is embellished with numerous fashion plates and illustrations. Published by Charles J. Peterson, Philadelphia, at $2 a year.

THE Southern Cultivator for April is to hand. This excellent agricultural periodical is published at Athens, Georgia. W. L. Jones, editor and proprietor. Price, $2 a year.

THE AMERICAN GARDEN is a monthly illustrated journal devoted to garden art. Edited and conducted by James Hogg, Brooklyn, New York.

THE Doctrines and Ministry of George Fox is a pamphlet of 22 pages, published by the Friends' Book Store, Philadelphia. We have received a copy.

THE American Artisan for April is, as usual, splendidly illustrated, and contains a vast amount of useful information.

THE convention composed of delegates from the Sunday schools of the Baptist, Presbyterian and Methodist churches of this city, says the Galveston Christian Advocate of April 10, was held in the basement of St. John's church, commencing on Friday morning, April 2, and closing on the following Sunday night. Rev. Dr. Paxson, of St. Louis, and Mr. Reynolds, a layman from Illinois, were in charge. The object of the convention was to awaken a deeper interest in the Sunday school work.

THERE are words which are worth as much as the best actions, for they contain the germ of them all.—Mme. Swetchine.

MORE unpleasant news comes from Mexico. The papists are fomenting troubles with the view of exciting a revolution, based on the suppression of the Sisters of Charity. Great excitement prevails at Acapulco, the scene of the recent assassination of Protestants. Groups of Romanists in the streets shout: "Death to the Protestants." Many Protestants, fearing violence, are preparing to emigrate.

THE British Parliament has under consideration three bills intended to check intemperance—one for closing the public houses in England on Sunday, another of the same intent for Ireland, and a permissive prohibitory liquor bill. A national petition in favor of the latter measure is being circulated in England by the United Kingdom Alliance.

THE movement of the soul along the path of duty, under the influence of holy love to God, constitutes what we call good works.—Erskine.

MARRIED.

HARDING—BURRUSS.—In the city of New Orleans, April 6, by Rev. Linus Parker, James M. Harding and Miss Caroline Eugenia Burruss.

MADDUX—WATTS.—At the residence of Dr. T. D. Maddux, Beatbridge, Tensas parish, Louisiana, on Monday, the fifth of April, by Rev. William Hart, Mr. W. N. Maddux, of Jefferson county, Mississippi, to Miss Louila B. Watts, of Uniontown, Perry county, Alabama.

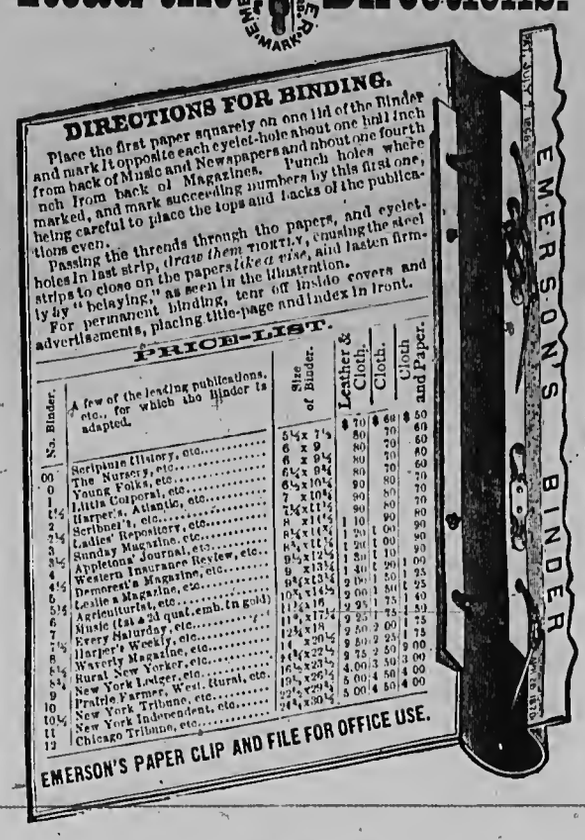
Read the EMERSON'S TRADE BINDER MARK Directions.



DIRECTIONS FOR BINDING.
Place the first paper squarely on one lid of the Binder and mark it opposite each eyelet-hole about one half inch from back of Music and Newspapers and about one fourth inch from back of Magazines. Punch holes where marked, and mark succeeding numbers by this first one, being careful to place the tops and backs of the publications even.
Passing the threads through the papers, and eyelet-holes in last strip, draw them TIGHTLY, causing the steel strips to close on the papers like a vise, and fasten firmly by "belaying," as seen in the illustration.
For permanent binding, tear off inside covers and advertisements, placing title-page and index in front.

MISTAKES.

A tiny maid once found a nest
Of new-born mice;
And filled with childish horror lest,
By grim device,
The house-cat should the place invest,
She sought advice.

Her ten-years brother, if he must,
Would take their care.
That night he told the boys with gust
How puss did fare;
And they pronounced his sister's trust
Verdancy rare!

How oft some little hope or aim
Is trusting bared
To those who, had we silent came,
Would ne'er have cared—
Save that, mayhap, malicious game
Might worse have fared.

FOR THE ADVOCATE.

Grandpa Goodale Stories.—No. 6.

BARNEY'S CONVERSION.

MY DEAR CHILDREN: It seems strange, doesn't it, that when we try so hard every night to get to the story about "How Barney Milked the Bays' Nest" something always turns up, just as we think we are sure of it, to prevent its being told? What do you say? Shall we try again to-night? All agreed? Well, now, if we don't stumble over some animal or bug that Tom has been studying about, that it will take all the evening to explain, perhaps we may get through.

"Tom must keep still," says Harry.

I am not so certain about that, my little man; the best way to learn is to take things one at a time, as we come across them in life, and study up all we can about them. It is a good rule never to pass by an opportunity to learn anything that is worth knowing, for the opportunity may never come again; but we will make a fair start to-night, at any rate.

You remember what a queer fellow Barney was. Well, one day my father was absent from home, and as I was then quite a lad—almost as large as Tom, in fact—he had left me in charge of the work on the farm, and I went out into the field where Barney was hoeing potatoes to see if he was doing his work right. You see Barney did not know much about the use of the hoe, for in Ireland, where he came from, they always cultivate the potato with a spade. He could handle a spade or a shillaly splendidly, but hoes and scythes he regarded as barbarous implements.

"But, grandpa, what is a shillaly?"

There, now, don't you see, Master Tom, you are interrupting me already? Well, you don't want to lose an opportunity to learn something, I suppose, so I will tell you. It is a short, thick stick, generally made of oak, with which the Irish fight one another at their fairs. I believe the name was taken from a forest in Ireland, of the same name, that is famous for its oaks, and at first they used to speak of fighting with "sticks from Shillaly," and then they would say: "Let us get up a bit of a shindy with our shillalies." While I am on this subject I might as well tell you about a new kind of bat Barney made for us boys. He would cut down a young oak that curved at the root and hew the bottom end flat, about four inches wide, with a turn of nearly a half circle, and shape the handle round, like an ordinary bat. He would place the ball on the ground, and, putting the curved end of the bat on top of the ball, would give a dextrous turn with the stick and catch the ball on top of the curve. Then he would toss the ball a little way into the air, and when it came down would strike it a blow that would send it straight up into the air, nearly out of sight, and so nearly in a perpendicular line that he rarely missed hitting it again when it came down. I am sure I have seen him keep a ball in the air in this way for fully fifteen minutes without once letting it touch the ground. Indeed I got quite expert in the use of this shillaly myself.

"Won't you show us how to use one, grandpa?"

Well, I don't know about that, Harry. You see my arms are not so limber as they were when I was your age; but I will show you how to make one, at any rate; and perhaps can put you on the track of using it. But, as I was saying, I found Barney hoeing in the field, and sorry work he was making of it too. I could not help laughing at him, and, taking his hoe, I said: "Now, Barney, watch me and see how I work; you mustn't strike with your hoe in that fashion, as though you were killing moles, but must draw the earth up lightly, as I do."

"Sure an' who could be afther usin' the barbarous machane at all?" said Barney. "Why can't I hev a dacint bit of a spade?"

I told him that he would like the hoe well enough after he got used to it, and that he could work much faster with it than with a spade, and without stooping so much.

GRANDPA GOODALE.

(To be continued.)

Grandpa Goodale Called Upon to Explain.

The following, from one of our little friends, will not be overlooked by Grandpa Goodale, we hope. As for the sort of a man he is, we will only say that he is very venerable, learned and good, and that he loves little children and the Sunday school.—EDITOR.

"SHREVEPORT, LA., April 2.

"MR. EDITOR: I too am a little girl, and a constant reader of the ADVOCATE, or rather of the Child's Corner. What sort of a man is Grandpa Goodale? He started to tell us, three weeks ago, 'How Barney Milked the Bays' Nest,' and I was all on tiptoe to get this week's ADVOCATE; but, instead of telling us, he gets off on a long string about toads and frogs, and does not explain a word about the Bays' Nest. I asked aunt about it, but she doesn't know any more about it than I do, though she is almost fifty years old. I hope you will be good enough to tell us about it, if Grandpa Goodale never does.

Truly, your little friend,

FLORENCE."

LOOK above you, and in the overarching firmament read the truth of an all-pervading Providence. Yon sky is God's outspread hand, and the glittering stars are the jewels on the fingers of the Almighty. Do you not see that his hand closes round you on all sides, and that you cannot go where universal love shines not?—Gill.

"I WISH I could prevail on neighbor Rip to keep the Sabbath," said good old Mr. Jones. "I'll tell you how to do it," exclaimed incisive young Smith; "get somebody to lend it to him, and I'll be bound that he'll keep it. He was never known to return anything that he borrowed."

A MAN who can take the place which God puts him in, and stick to it and fight it through, and stand a man every inch, has, I think, waiting an estate of glory such as has not been known in this world.

RENOVATING BITTERS!!

Purify the Blood.

STRENGTHEN, INVIGORATE AND RENOVATE SYSTEM.

One of the best remedies known for the speedy cure of

DYSPEPSIA,

Loss of Appetite, Sour Stomach, Flatulence, Heartburn, Nausea, Fluttering of the Heart, Fainting Sensations, Sudden Flushes of Heat, Depression of Spirits or Melancholy, Water Brash, and Chronic or Nervous Debility. They are Diuretic, Tonic, Alterative and Stomachic. They perfectly eradicate all Bilious disorders arising from a foul stomach, strengthening the system and regulating the functions of the Liver.

Any one suffering with Weak Nerves, Deranged Liver, Kidney Complaint, Loss of Appetite, Fever and Ague, or any of the diseases or symptoms enumerated above, can be materially benefited and entirely cured by the use of these Bitters.

FOR FEMALES.

It is an established fact that fully one-half of the females are in bad health; or, in other words, never feel well. Many suffer with inward weakness. They feel languid, devoid of energy, extremely nervous, and have no appetite. To this class the Renovating Bitters are especially recommended. Such patients should resort to the use of these Bitters, the invariable result of which will be a strong and healthy constitution, a disappearance of all nervousness, a good appetite and a perfect restoration to health.

Thousands have testified to the merits of these Bitters. I would strongly advise all suffering with the above-named complaints to try them and be convinced.

Full directions accompany each bottle. Price, $1 per bottle, or six bottles for $5.

A MAN OF A THOUSAND.

A Consumptive Cured.

When death was hourly expected from CONSUMPTION, all remedies having failed, accident led to a discovery whereby Dr. H. JAMES cured his only child with a preparation of Cannabis Indica. He now gives this recipe free on receipt of two stamps to pay expenses. There is not a single symptom of Consumption that it does not dissipate—Night Sweats, Irritation of the Nerves, Difficult Expectoration, Sharp Pains in the Lungs, Nausea at the Stomach, Inaction of the Bowels, and Wasting of the Muscles. Mobile	2,903
Texas	521
Total	10,252

On Saturday the market opened with only a moderate inquiry, mostly from buyers who claimed further concessions, which factors were unwilling to admit, and the movement during the morning was consequently on a limited scale, but as several offers for lists of some magnitude were pending it was hoped that later in the day it would show increased activity and result in even more than an average business. The offers referred to, however, were not accepted, and operations were restricted accordingly, the entire business being confined to the limited amount of 1,800 bales. On Monday the movement commenced under the depressing influence of a decline of 1-16d, at Liverpool, and under a limited demand the sales up to noon embraced barely 800 bales, after which, although factors met the demand freely and the previous falling off at Liverpool was recovered, there was little change, and the entire business of the day was confined to 1,800 bales. On Tuesday there was little done during the morning, but later in the day, as factors met the demand at a reduction of about ⅛c., buyers came forward comparatively freely, and the entire business summed up 3,650 bales. Prices exhibited considerable irregularity.

The above makes an aggregate for the past three days of 7,250 bales, against 17,000 for the corresponding time last week and 13,350 the week before.

The receipts proper at this port since the first of September, exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas, are 938,875 bales, against 1,121,334 bales to the same date last year, and the decrease in the receipts at all the ports up to the latest mail dates, as compared with last year, is 218,280 bales. The decrease by the reports per telegraph is 223,334—3,264,895 against 3,490,198. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same date last year, there is an increase of 22,336 bales to Great Britain, and a decrease of 32,838 to France and 130,743 to other foreign ports. OF THE

NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

Alphabetically Arranged, Under the Heads of the Business or Articles Advertised.

NOTE.—We take no advertisements except from those who we have good reason to believe are respectable and reliable. The publisher urges his solicitor and agents to seek the advertisements of the most worthy and reliable representatives in every branch of business, and not to apply to or accept business from persons of doubtful character. We have refused business to the extent of thousands of dollars each year for want of satisfactory information in reference to applicants. We think we may safely claim for the list below that it embraces, as a rule, the very best men and firms in the different branches represented.

News of the Week.

DOMESTIC.

WASHINGTON, Apr. 16.—The Navy Department has received a communication from Captain Queen, commanding the United States steamer Saranac, dated Acapulco, March 27, he having been ordered thither to inquire into the circumstances attending the death by violence of an American citizen.

Captain Queen reports that during last fall Procopio C. Diaz and other residents of Acapulco, all natives and citizens of Mexico, organized a congregation for religious worship according to the Protestant creed.

The meetings were held on Sundays and other days in the house of Diaz, and were strictly of a private character. Diaz and some members of his flock were occasionally stoned by the populace and otherwise annoyed, but sustained no serious damage to their persons. In December last Rev. H. M. Hutchinson, head of the Presbyterian mission in Mexico, was solicited by the congregation to become their pastor, and to organize the congregation in a more formal manner. Converts were added to the church, and in all the society numbered about sixty-eight persons, mostly natives of the country. Preaching took place and prayer meetings were held at Diaz's residence. They looked for a suitable building for church purposes, and soon rented one which had served as a Roman Catholic church, subsequently used by the French invaders, and afterward had been occupied as a mercantile warehouse. The chapel was formally opened in January last, Mr. Hutchinson officiating as pastor.

After the services the congregation retired without any fear of injury from their enemies. On the twenty-fifth of that month Mr. Hutchinson did not attend the chapel, the services being conducted by Mr. Diaz. There were present thirty or forty members. A few minutes after eight o'clock in the evening, as the congregation were singing the last hymn, a disturbance was occasioned by forty Mexicans, armed with machetes and muskets.

From the testimony adduced on the examination into the disturbances, only six or eight of these armed men entered the building, the others remaining outside for the purpose, it is said, of finishing the Protestants who should attempt to escape. The struggle in the chapel did not continue more than eight minutes. Shots were fired, but the principal damage was done by the machetes. The Protestants, after the assassins retired, barricaded their chapel as a means of protection from the force outside. The military commander and his aids soon reached the spot and were directly followed by forty soldiers from the garrison.

The district judge and his secretary also appeared upon the scene and ordered those inside to open the doors of the chapel. This the Protestants refused to do until they were assured that the party so ordering were their friends. It was then ascertained, according to official inquiry, that three men and one woman had been killed, and eleven men wounded. Among the number killed was a colored man named Henry Morris, and a native of Boston. His body was fearfully mangled and his head was almost severed from his body. He had frequently been warned by his friends not to go to the meetings, as there were reasons for believing that by doing so he would place his life in danger.

A woman was killed by a bullet passing through her head, and a man was found in a dying condition. This man was of the attacking party, and was shot by Diaz, who was badly wounded, having received eight wounds. Mr. Hutchinson, on the evening of the attack, on being advised to remove to other quarters, went to the California Hotel. An American guard was sent there to protect him should an attempt be made on his life. By advice of the United States consul he went on board of a vessel and sailed for San Francisco.

Captain Queen says the majority of the people of Acapulco influenced and approved the extermination of the Protestants. He has reason to believe that the teaching and influence of the Roman Catholic curate instigated the assault; in his sermons he never condemned the outrage. A petition had been presented to General Alvarez, the Governor of the State, asking for the expulsion of the Protestants. Even if it should appear that the curate was implicated, the Governor would not have the necessary force to sustain him in the inquiry. Nothing had been done to bring the offenders to punishment. Any energetic steps to this end would have the effect of increasing the excitement and occasioning fresh outbreaks. A formal accusation against the curate was pending, but there seemed no prospect of bringing him to account, owing to the present unfavorable condition of affairs.

NASHVILLE, April 17.—One-quarter of an inch of ice this morning. Exposed vegetation is frozen. It is believed the fruit, wheat and cotton in this and adjoining States are seriously injured, if not entirely killed.

WASHINGTON, April 17.—The temperature is below freezing-point in New England, the Middle States, the Ohio valley, the lake region, Tennessee and the Northwest.

CINCINNATI, April 17.—Reports from Kentucky, Indiana and Ohio show that the weather during the last two days has been the coldest for the season known in years, the thermometer ranging from twelve to twenty-five degrees above zero. The early fruits are thought to be killed and the tobacco seriously injured.

LOUISVILLE, April 17.—Quite heavy snow fell here yesterday and to-day and to-night. The thermometer is several degrees below freezing-point. Telegrams to the Courier-Journal state that a snow-storm and very cold weather have prevailed throughout Kentucky and Tennessee, and that great damage has been done to fruits and tobacco plants.

MONROE, VA., April 18.—Three inches of snow fell here last night.

AUGUSTA, GA., April 18.—There was a killing frost here last night, doing serious injury in Georgia and South Carolina. It was the hardest freeze in years. Truck farms are badly injured.

RICHMOND, VA., April 19.—Heavy snow at intervals yesterday, with high, cold wind. At sunrise this morning the thermometer was eight degrees below freezing.

Early vegetables and fruits and young clover are killed. Advices from various parts of the State give disastrous accounts of damage from cold.

LOUISVILLE, April 20.—Reports to the Courier-Journal from all parts of the State say great damage was done to fruit and tobacco plants by the unseasonable frost and snow of last week. The last season was a very dull one for tobacco-growers in Kentucky, and much destitution has followed in consequence. Another bad season, which seems now probable, will greatly increase the suffering. The other crops, however, seem not to have been greatly injured.

FOREIGN.

BERLIN, April 14.—The government journals give tranquillizing assurances in regard to the relations of Prussia with foreign powers.

In the Upper House of the Prussian Diet to-day the bill withdrawing the State grants from the Roman Catholic clergy was under debate. Prince Bismarck made a speech, in which he declared that since the Vatican Council Catholic bishops were merely the Pope's prefects. He said he was not an enemy of the Catholic Church; he warred only against the papacy, which had adopted the principle of the extermination of heretics, and which was in enmity with the gospel as well as with the Prussian State.

Agents of the French government have made contracts in Bohemia for ten thousand horses, to be delivered next June.

BERLIN, April 20.—The National Gazette asserts that Austria and Russia will support Germany in her demands.

From the Work.

LOUISVILLE CIRCUIT, LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.—Mr. Editor: I have several lots of land secured, and two churches in process of erection. I received a cordial welcome, found kind, liberal-hearted friends, a right royal Methodist home, and every comfort. God is at work in this section of "Brush College." A revival spirit pervades the entire work; sinners are converted at almost every service, and some have found peace at home and joined the church. Up to date eleven have joined the church, and six or eight are lingering on the threshold for a convenient season. God grant that the time may soon arrive when the blessed cross of Jesus shall have been lifted to every mortal's gaze.

A. E. CLAY, P. C.

APRIL 14, 1875.

WAYNE CT., MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.—Mr. Editor: The first quarterly meeting for this circuit was held last Saturday and Sunday. Our presiding elder, Bro. John A. Ellis, reached the place of holding the Conference on Saturday in time to preach. In the evening the Conference was held. The various interests of the church were closely and patiently inquired into. On Sunday the Bishops' collection was taken up, and forty cents over the entire amount assessed to the circuit was paid. The board of stewards have made liberal allowances for the support of their preachers. Owing to the pressure of the times the present outlook appears rather gloomy, but the final outlook is encouraging. There are many noble Christian men and women here who are friends to the preacher. From these I have received many acts of kindness. God bless the people of Wayne circuit, temporally and spiritually.

D. A. LITTLE, P. C.

STOP NOW!—Better stop now. Some years ago, near Princeton, N. J., some young men were skating on a pond around an "air-hole," when the ice began to break in. Some of them stopped, but a young man said: "I am not afraid! Give us one round more!" He swung nearly round, when the ice broke, and not till next day was his lifeless body found. So men go on in sin. They are warned. They expect soon to stop. But they say: "Give us one round more!" They start, but with wild crash break through into bottomless perdition. Do not risk it any longer. Stop now!—Talmage.

Letter from England.

MR. EDITOR: The trade in degrees continues. Some men are exceedingly covetous of talls. Monkeys have camial characteristics, and if Darwinianism is correct it is not unnormal for man to desire a tail. Advertisements are inserted in the papers in reference to degrees. A boy applied for a title and he received this response:

Dear Sir: Your letter to M. A. on the subject of degrees is duly to hand, and in reply thereto I am happy to inform you that I am in a position to influence degrees in divinity and arts from both Germany and America. Degrees from Germany are some little trouble (require a knowledge of Latin) and the fees are high—namely: M. A., £25; D. D., £45. Degrees from America are not so difficult, provided you can give sufficient proof, by testimonial or otherwise, of qualification. The fees are £15, with £2 extra for those degrees that give the title of doctor. The university is one of repute in the United States, and the diplomas, which are very handsome, are held by clergymen of the Church of England, registered medical gentlemen, and others of high social position. If the fees are too high I can secure you the M. D. degree from a college for £10. Waiting your early reply,

I am, dear sir, yours truly,

Another correspondent states his terms to be: Ph. D., £15; M. A., £20.

Time works wonders. Thirty years ago a Primitive Methodist minister was incarcerated three months in Abingdon gaol for preaching in the town. A Methodist M. P. now owns the old gaol, which is no longer used as a prison. The preacher-prisoner sought and obtained permission from the present proprietor to preach in the place where he was once imprisoned. He also asked leave to cut a piece of wood from his former cell, that he might keep it as a memorial of his incarceration. Methodists should not forget their history. There were heroes among the early Methodist ministry—martyrs in purpose and spirit, who would have gone to the stake with firm and unfaltering step rather than forsake the Master. If the martyr spirit still exists, the old persecuting spirit remains also.

Courtesy is troubled at Cardinal Manning's presence. The professor of divinity at Oxford writes to the Times, of London, concerning the place in society which the new cardinal will be assigned. He is scared because he thinks his eminence will not be satisfied with any place on public occasions but what will be in keeping with his new-conferred dignity—viz.: next to the sovereign. This same professor, at a public banquet, left the hall where it was held in indignation because Dr. Manning's arch-episcopal rank was recognized by the undergradnates of the university, thus placing him before the Anglican bishop. Dr. Manning will insist on a recognition of his official dignity. He will abate nothing of the proud pretensions of this lordly dignity. But then what of New York? What of Yankee society? Is not Archbishop McCloskey, of that city, a cardinal too? Where will he be put on public occasions? Before Bishop Potter? Before Bishop Simpson? Before Dr. Hall? Before Talmage? I trow not.

A daily paper here says of the civil rights bill that it is not a statesmanly measure, and will not work well. The negro is not sufficiently advanced in the scale of intelligence to assume all that the bill confers. It is to be hoped that education will be pushed forward. Unless the negro is educated he must fail to exercise his political freedom beneficially.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey held one of their services in London a few evenings ago, in a theater. Dean Stanley, two canons and about sixty clergymen of the Established Church were present. Long before the hour fixed for the commencement of the service every part of the theater was densely packed, while upon the stage sat a large number of ministers of all denominations, ladies and gentlemen. The striking scene that was presented in the gaily decorated, gandy theater, with its mass of upturned, earnest faces, was one that will not soon be forgotten by those who saw it; while one could not but think of the vastly different occasion which called that audience together to the occasion which called the last audience that filled the building there—the one having for its object the satisfaction of the cravings for recreation and amusement in the human mind; the other having for its object the far higher and more noble aim of satisfying those longings which are called by philosophers the "emotional religious sentiments of man," but which are doubtless placed by God in the human heart to lead us to search for that truth which, fortunately for us, is within our reach, but which the ancients plied and groped for in vain. The meeting was a great success. Mr. Sankey sang, in his wonderfully impressive manner, and with his clear intonations and powerful yet mellow voice ringing through the building with visible effect, the touching solo:

"There were ninety and nine that safely lay
In the shelter of the fold."

Seldom has there been heard a singer—and never, should we say, a religious singer—who could more visibly move an audience by the sympathetic and deeply touching manner of his rendering, and few will forget the pathos with which he invests the words in the verse:

"But none of the ransomed ever knew
How deep were the waters crossed,
Nor how dark was the night that the Lord passed through Ere he found his sheep that were lost."

In London, as elsewhere, signs and wonders are being wrought by the simple preaching of the gospel, which is still the power of God.

Attention, Delegates!

Delegates to the International Sunday School Convention to be held at Baltimore, Md., beginning on May 11, 1875, will please note the following points, viz.:

1. From States where Union Sunday School Associations exist each delegate is expected to bring his written credentials from said association.

2. From States where such associations do not exist delegates may receive credentials as follows: Northwestern States and Territories, from E. Payson Porter, Chicago, Ill.; Central States, from Rev. A. J. Baird, D. D., Nashville, Tenn.; Gulf States, from N. D. Cross, Selma, Ala.; South Atlantic States, from S. A. Nelson, Charleston, S. C.; Virginia, from J. L. M. Curry, LL. D., Richmond; Eastern and Middle States, from Rev. George A. Peltz, Newark, N. J.

3. Accredited delegates desiring entertainment at Baltimore, please address Rev. H. A. Smeltz, No. 8 North Charles street, Baltimore, Md., before May 1.

4. For information concerning traveling accommodation, address as follows:

Alabama—N. D. Cross, Selma.
California—A. H. Post, San Francisco.
Colorado—Rev. James French, Denver.
Georgia—W. B. Haygood, Buford.
Kentucky—Rev. J. L. McKee, Danville.
South Carolina—S. A. Nelson, Charleston.
Tennessee—Rev. A. J. Baird, Nashville.

MR. MOODY'S HUMOR.—He applied the case of the man out of whom the devils were cast to young converts, and wisely exhorted them to "confess Christ." He said he could fancy the man going home to Decapolis and telling his friends and his neighbors until a crowd gathered. Then he could "fancy" the man getting upon a barrel or something, and telling them all about it. The consequence was that a great revival broke out through the preaching of this converted layman, "so that all men did marvel." He also pictured very graphically the woman who had spent all her money on physicians, and "became no better," etc. She had tried all the doctors, he said, but in vain. They had her money, but she rather grew worse. She was told that Jesus of Nazareth would cure her for nothing. So she went to him and pushed her way through, until she "touched his garments" and was healed. Many were like the woman now, he said. They went to any and every physician instead of Jesus. Many were like the disciples that were in the multitude: they did not know the difference between the "touch of the crowd and the touch of faith;" but Christ knew. And the woman found that there was more healing power in the garments of the Savior than in all the apothecaries' shops in Palestine!—Mr. Moody in London.

MEXICO.—We have the Two Republics of Mexico, with dates to the seventh instant, from which the following is gleaned:

The government has refused to accede to the petition of the Mercantile Center of Vera Cruz, asking that the circulation of foreign money be prohibited in the republic.

Governor Aurelians Rivera, who was wounded in a street fight by Colonel Diaz not long since, is pronounced out of danger.

Several cases of yellow fever have proved fatal at Vera Cruz.

Preparations are making in Merida for another revolution.

One of the Jesuits expelled from the country two years ago has returned.

Ice brought from Popocatepetl is sold in the City of Mexico.—New Orleans Picayune, April 17.

Our Dearly-Loved Brother.

In the place of my writing I need not even call his name. Other men have left behind them a profound feeling of respect, of veneration, of sorrow, some even of affection, among all classes of people. Bro. Wilkinson alone, of all the men I have ever known, awakened so widely the deeper emotion of love as to leave behind him a whole community of mourners. A mere stranger might have noticed the purely external indications of this love in the church draped and decked with the rarest floral offerings, and crowded with a vast concourse of sorrowing ones, who followed his remains to their last resting-place, instead of turning away from the church, as is their usual wont. He, too, might have melted to tears when the little children, with hearts so full as almost to check utterance, sang the hymns he especially loved, and literally covered his grave with flowers and watered them with their tears.

A stranger could not have failed to mark the absolute silence, that had fallen like a pall of sorrow upon that entire mixed assembly; but a stranger could not have noticed that the immense throng of mourners was composed of every class of people, and that tears were streaming down cheeks that had not been so wet since infancy. The tie that bound him to all hearts was the threefold cord of love. To say that never before in this city was seen such a funeral conveys no idea at all of the reality. I sincerely believe that each person, regardless of age, race, religious creed, and of all other distinctions, in that long procession felt a personal bereavement. The funeral of the celebrated Rev. F. W. Robertson is the only one of which I have read that was at all like it. The whole community, as if moved by a common impulse, put on the mourner's badge. That all who had been stirred by his moving eloquence were filled with admiration for his brilliant genius is not remarkable, for he was an orator of a very high order of talent; that all who had come under the purifying influence of his daily life had felt themselves elevated to a higher and holier plane—this was inevitable, for he lived so near the divine One that his life was a mirror of the true life; but that all men should have been drawn to him in the grandest and strongest union that knits together human hearts, while it does not seem remarkable to those of us who knew him best, was certainly unusual in the extreme. The secret we knew to be that all-embracing love which he felt for others, which fell like a heavenly benediction on every household when he crossed the threshold, and went not away with him. He loved; hence he was beloved.

A few remarks which I have heard from men, in some instances not of the church, will show the deep hold he had upon the hearts of all. Said one: "Your church should be closed for a year and draped in mourning." Another: "I feel that the main support of morality and piety in this community has fallen!" And yet another: "He was the purest-minded man I ever knew."

Many have spoken, during the last few days, in tearful recognition of him as having led them to a higher life. Bereaved ones have spoken of the comfort he has given them, and destitute ones of pecuniary aid furnished from an income that could but ill afford it.

It is not my intention to write his obituary. I wish merely to give expression to what I know to be the feeling of every heart who knew him in the single utterance: "I loved him."

It was my happy fortune to be much with him during his last illness. The confidences of the sick-room are always sacred; but here, as through his whole life, the most delicate tenderness of feeling finds nothing to conceal. That which in other men would be called delirium in him seemed like a seraphic vision. On one occasion he called me from an adjoining room, where I had retired for a few moments' rest, and said: "Oh, Bro. G., I want you to write it out for the ADVOCATE. Did you see that glorious choir of angels? And when those beautiful children came up with their chorus of voices—oh, it was rapture!" And the face of the sick man was beaming with light, and the light was from heaven. I never stop, in times like these, to speak of objective and subjective relations. I believe that the angels were there, and I felt an indescribable longing for that refined vision of my dying friend, that I might see them too. He appeared to be perfectly conscious, but wrapped up in his wonderful vision, and anxious only that others should share it with him. To him, at least, it was a most intense reality. "Oh," he said, "I want no stronger confirmation than this." He repeatedly told those of us that were most with him that we did not know now the raptures he was experiencing, but that we would know some time. And in effect, to him at least, however we may explain it, the shining ones had crossed the river to bear him home to heaven.

I do not feel able to attempt an analysis of his character, though I knew him intimately. In such an attempt the impulse is strong to write all the adjectives employed in the superlative degree. I feel like saying: He was the most chaste, the least affected, the least mercenary man I ever knew, and so on through the entire list of qualities.

Surely all will bear testimony that the prevailing impression from his saintly life, and one which penetrated with a sanctifying influence all classes of society, was that of his Christ-like purity of character. In this regard, at least, his place was in the van of the Christian ranks, holding up the banner inscribed with the call:

"Be ye followers of me, even as I also am of Christ."

As a public speaker he had few equals in the whole church. Possessed of an uncommon command of language, and of a constantly increasing power to grasp and analyze the most profound truths, he sent them home to the hearts of his hearers literally red with the fire of his own conviction, and impelled with all the force and grace of the true orator.

As a student he worked even to exhaustion. His days were mostly spent in his pastoral duties, and his nights, even to the "small hours," in study. Neither seemed a task to him. No soldier ever sprang with more alacrity to the call of duty than did he. No one in all his large pastorate was forgotten by him but himself; and this self-abnegation became at length self-sacrifice, for the pneumonia found his nervous system so exhausted that it could not withstand the shock, and the attendant physician had scarcely a hope of his recovery from the first. His loss to this community seems irreparable, and in the church a void is felt around which the valiant soldiers of the cross will march and countermarch for many years in vain attempt to fill it, unless the Master shall sooner send us an Elisha clothed with Elijah's mantle.

Attention, Mississippi Conference!

MR. EDITOR: Please allow me as secretary of the Mississippi Conference, and as treasurer of the Ministerial Educational Association, to call the attention of the members to the following resolution passed at their last session, viz.:

Resolved, That in view of bringing the subject of education more prominently before our people we recommend that during the month of next May this subject be brought before our various congregations in such way as pastors may think best, and that on these occasions, and at the discretion of our ministers in charge, collections be made in every congregation to assist in the payment of the tuition of candidates for the ministry, within our bounds and attending our colleges, and that the funds so collected be transmitted at once to the treasurer of the Ministerial Educational Association.

We have eight choice young men at Centenary College preparing for the ministry; and while we by no means expect to charge them tuition, still we would be glad if the church would assist the professors of the college in this work they are doing so cheerfully for the benefit of the whole connection.

It is to be hoped that all our preachers in charge will carry out this resolution in its letter and spirit. They will thus advertise their colleges, bring the matter of education closer to their people, and secure material aid for the education of our young ministers.

THE PROMISE OF THE PRESENCE

BY THE AUTHOR OF "CHRONICLES OF THE SCHONBERG-COTTA FAMILY."

"Lo, I am with you alway" all the days even unto the end of the world."

The olden days, the morning days,
With thousand promises lit
They sparkled over the dewy ways
When Earth and Time and Man were young.

To us the promise is but one—
One light-point gathers all the rays
To us he speaketh through the Son
"Lo, I am with you alway" "the days."

Wealth, peace and ample heritage,
Homes full of life, and life of bliss,
Long life, with silver crowns of age—
To us is promised none of this.

Yet we are richer far than they;
Their thousand were but stars at night
But "I am with you every day"
Is Day itself, with all its light.

No promise what the days shall bring—
Some must be dark with storm and hail
To each its measured load will cling,
But "I am with you" "the days."

No promise what the days shall be;
They led those through no easy ways,
And our true path is following there;
But "they are with us" "the days."

Not "as thy day thy strength shall be;"
Still deeper hopes to us belong;
We may be blind, but God can see—
We may be weak, but thou art strong.

With us through each bewildering maze,
Each step of the untrodden way;
With us all day, and all the days,
Till days and nights dawn to the Day.

Who Is Sufficient for These Things?

MR. EDITOR: One of the fathers said that under the ponderous weight of ministerial responsibility "the shoulders of angels themselves might groan." I am coming to believe it. The post is hazardous—the niche is hard to fill. One must be studious and reserved, yet without moroseness; cheerful and sociable, yet without levity; mild and pacific, yet without lukewarmness; warm and zealous, yet without bigotry. Such prudence, such purpose, such diligence and devotion does it require that

"The patriach pupil, dying,
Will leave his lesson half unlearned."

The most difficult part to discharge conscientiously and escape censure is perhaps that known as "pastoral visiting;" and upon this I wish to make a few observations. Think not I am about to rush where experience sometimes fears to tread, and offer advice upon this important and delicate sphere of clerical duty; quite the reverse—I want advice. I have been frequently told by those to whom long experience and fragrant piety give the right of being "patristic," that it is essential to the spiritual well-being of every pastoral charge; that mere pulpit brilliance is at best a wretched atonement for failure in spiritual oversight. Having been at "the front" but a short while, my experience is meager, but my observation fully sustains this assertion. I have in my mind's eye now a church whose past history and present state is a living proof of its correctness. This church has enjoyed for years the pulpit services of men who are acknowledged on all sides to be the peers of any in the land, but unfortunately under circumstances withholding the benefits flowing from the pastoral relation. The result is significant; upon the walls of its spiritual temple, once clothed in the beauty of holiness, "Ichabod" might truly be written. I have seen others served by men who certainly were not brilliant, at times hardly entertaining in the pulpit, and their prosperity has been marked. If the reason be sought it is always given in these words: "He is a model pastor." These things convince me of my duty and of the spiritual utility of this relation, and from the first there has been interwoven with my most cherished plans and purposes the determination to be a "model pastor." And, sir, it is a protracted and I believe a faithful attempt to carry out this determination that wrings from me the words at the head of this article: "Who is sufficient for these things?" I am not willing to believe that this is an essential feature of the pastoral work; am more inclined to attribute the trouble to a want of experience and information. I therefore take this method of stating the obstacle, hoping that some one "who is sufficient for these things" will assist his younger brethren by giving them the benefit of his experience.

In the first place, what is pastoral visiting? Is it a spiritual oversight of the church? Does it consist in visiting the members, conversing on religion, confirming the faithful, warning the secure, encouraging the despondent, and comforting the afflicted? A short visit, of which prayer, praise and religious conversation are prominent features—is this, when performed in the spirit of the Master, with a fervent praying for and humble dependence upon the help of God—is this pastoral visiting? If so, one more question: Is this what the people expect and fail to receive? They certainly expect and fail to receive something, for it is by no means uncommon to hear on many charges the complaint: "Our pastor does not visit enough." What I want to get at is what this complaint means. Is it an indication of an unfaithful performance of duty on our part, or is it simply an evidence that the world is still burdened with people who will not consider? Is it the loss of this spiritual oversight—the infrequency of the kind of visits above described—that they deplore? or in a majority of cases, where the "pastoral gimlet" is used, is it not because of the dearth of social visits? If the former, then the complaint is just, and we must reap the fruit of our negligence; but if the latter, is not the complaint wrong and disastrous?

There is, it strikes me, a broad difference between a pastoral and a social visit. One is to benefit them spiritually—for spiritual communion; the other to enjoy the luxury of the social affections. One is a religious duty; the other a pleasant recreation. One can be the growth of human will; the other must be the spontaneous outflow of the human heart. One can be demanded; but can the other? That is the question I should like to hear answered. And right here lies the trouble, the obstacle, with which we young men have to contend. These social visits are required—in many cases not sought so much as demanded—and if not made, away goes the credit if not the reality of being "pastors." Is the picture overdrawn? Pardon me, and I will produce its counterpart from my short experience. Bro. A. is a man I like; Bro. B. is a man I love. Said the former: "I protest against your partial way of visiting. You go to Bro. B.'s twice as often as to my house. I think you ought to visit all alike." Was that all? No. He declined to pay the latter half of his assessment, stating that those who received the pastor's services could pay for them. Now I had made more pastoral visits to Bro. A. than to Bro. B. It is true I had visited Bro. B. more frequently, but not pastorally. I went because it was a pleasant refuge after work. When the tired nerve and taxed brain clamored for rest, books and papers were thrown aside and a social hour spent with genial Bro. B. Now I did not go as his pastor, but as his friend. It was not a pastoral but a social visit—not duty, but recreation—something that threw the sunshine of tranquillity and cheerfulness into my life, and helped my feet along the road which, we all know, is not without its weariness. I would have rejoiced in the maintenance of the same soothing and agreeable fellowship with Bro. A.; but somehow he did not win my heart like the other, nor was his home as sunny, though it was a "mansion," and the other an unpretentious dwelling of only three rooms. (He wasn't rich, sir, but his heart was.) I wanted to love and visit them all alike; and although no former pastor had ever been able to accomplish this feat, I determined to try it. I thought the trouble must be in me, and not in them, and I started out to divide as equitably as possible my social as well as pastoral visits; but, sir, I soon found that I was mortal, a "child of nature," like the rest. Some hedged themselves about with a wire-drawn system of misery and constraint, where cheerfulness, sociability and cordial friendship couldn't get a breath. Some drew themselves up in solitary grandeur, and it was only when I came, Testament in hand, as a pastor that I had the nerve and firmness to approach. Others met me with kind and courteous ways, and made their homes perfect oases in the desert of my social visiting; and, sir, there I rested. How, in the name of human nature, could I help it? And how, in the name of the same human nature, could I make myself socially at home among the others? And then, sir, in defiance of my resolution the feeling crept in that my social visits must be sought, and not demanded; that if they wished the pastor to visit them socially they ought to go about it pretty much as they do to gain the visits of any friend: that he was a man, and could not parcel out his friendships and social visits by rule, any more than any other man in the community; that a kind and conciliatory manner would go further to propitiate and secure his social visits than all complaints; that his pastoral visits might be demanded, his social visits never. And that if his pastoral work was well done, and yet no social visits made, they should seek for the cause in themselves, and cease the disheartening complaint: "Our pastor does not visit enough." Now if this feeling is wrong I am willing to disown it and if there is a way to avoid these troubles I will be rejoiced to pursue it.

Would not a little advice from the older and experienced men upon this point benefit both us and the people?

Allow me to say in conclusion that as far as my determination to be a pastor is concerned, "none of these things move me." I not only feel that I am in the path of duty, but I love my work—there is an eager springing of my heart in its performance. My experience is short, but it has shown me abundantly that this blessed work offers honors the brightest and pleasures the purest out of heaven. And although the post is so hazardous that the prudence of an angel would hardly escape censure, yet, O sir, if we utter every word and perform every deed with an eye single to the glory of God, if not on earth, at least in heaven, will not Prudence "be justified of her children?"

ALABAMA, April 3, 1875.

The Human Heart.

Fearfully dark and utterly corrupt, the natural heart is the seat of evil and the fountain of impurity; and out of it come all the sin and iniquity of lip and life. Says Jesus: "Out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false witness, blasphemies." Paul, to the Galatians, says: "Now the works of the flesh are manifest, which are these: adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, seditions, heresies, envyings, murders, drunkenness, revelings and such like."—Galatians v, 19.

Naturally depraved and practically wicked, the human heart is necessarily unhappy unless cleansed by the blood of Jesus and made to rejoice with the salvation of God. By nature it is naked, blind, starving, wretched. It is without peace, without joy and without hope. "The wicked are like the troubled sea, when it cannot rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt. There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked."—Isaiah lvii, 20, 21. Bad as is the heart in itself, revolting as it is in its outgrowths of sin and iniquity, troubled, unhappy and burdened, nevertheless God has said to every human being: "My son, give me thine heart." He asks it on the ground of absolute right, for he stands related to us as our Creator, Preserver, Savior and Judge.

But why demands he so vile a thing as the human heart?

1. That he may enlighten it. "Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light."—Ephesians v, 14.

2. That he may convince it, for by his Spirit "he reproves the world of sin, and of righteousness and of judgment."—John xvi, 8.

3. That he may pardon it. "Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts; and let him return unto the Lord, and he will have mercy upon him; and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon."—Isaiah lv, 7.

4. That he may sanctify it. "Wherefore Jesus also, that he might sanctify the people with his own blood, suffered without the gate."—Hebrews xiii, 12. "And the very God of peace sanctify you wholly; and I pray God your whole spirit and soul and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ."—First Thessalonians v, 23.

5. That he may keep it. "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee."—Isaiah xxvi, 3.

6. That he may dignify it and make it happy. "Delight thyself also in the Lord; and he shall give thee the desires of thine heart."—Psalms xxxvii, 4. "Wait on the Lord and keep his way, and he shall exalt thee to inherit the land."—Psalms xxxvii, 34.

7. That he may eternally save it. "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which, according to his abundant mercy, hath begotten us again unto a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you, who are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time."—First Peter i, 3, 4, 5. "Though he were a son, yet learned he obedience by the things which he suffered; and, being made perfect, he became the Author of eternal salvation unto all them that obey him."—Hebrews v, 8, 9. "And as it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment, so Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many; and unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time, without sin unto salvation."—Hebrews ix, 27, 28.

Would any man comply with God's demand for his heart, then must he yield it up humbly, for "thus saith the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is holy: I dwell in the high and holy place, with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit, to revive the spirits of the humble and to revive the heart of the contrite ones."—Isaiah lvii, 15.

The heart must be given to God believingly. "He that cometh unto God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him." Receiving his word as truth and his Son as our only and all-sufficient Savior, we are to place our heart's trust in God.

We are to give up our hearts to him unreservedly. All must be given—every faculty and power of the soul—the understanding, the will, the judgment, the memory, the affections, the conscience, all that there is in and of us. We are to hold back no part of the price; the citadel, with all its garrison and stores, is to be given up; every lurking, secret sin of the heart or imagination must be yielded; we must undergo a thorough crucifixion of the flesh, and submit to be purged and purified by the indwelling Spirit of God; in short, we are to make an unconditional surrender to him who says: "My son, give me thine heart."

We are to do this cheerfully. "Know thou the God of thy father, and serve him with a perfect heart and a willing mind."—First Chronicles xxviii, 9. The heart must be given to God irrevocably; not for any special period of time, but for time and eternity—forever. We must be able to exclaim with David: "This God is our God forever and ever; he will be our guide even unto death."—Psalms xlviii, 14. God's demand must be answered immediately. He does not say: "My son, think about this matter; consider whether it be not well for thee to become reconciled to me next year or next week, or when about to die." All God's commands to the penitent are absolute and of unmistakable meaning, and call for immediate, decisive action. "My son, give me thine heart." The verb here is give; it is in the present tense; its subject is thou; it means thee, young man—thee, young woman—thee, sinner—thee, whoever thou art, if God has not already possession of thy heart. Delay no longer, but give God thine heart now; and by genuine repentance and godly sorrow destroy all means of retreat, and by faith in Christ's shed blood push out boldly for God's throne of grace, where there is mercy and pardon for the asking aright.

"To-day, if ye will hear my voice, harden not your heart."

Holiness—A Gift or a Work?

MR. EDITOR: On the above controversy I would simply suggest that if God gave Adam holy principles only, leaving him to attain a holy state by practice, how are we to understand the moral status of one newly converted? Only made good, but not holy? And will he have to live awhile in obedience to these good principles before he attains holiness? If so, where is the error of getting holiness by works? Again, what if he dies right away? Will the bare good principle be sufficient? If so, what of the text so often quoted: "Without holiness no man shall see the Lord?" Adam was created neither holy nor unholy! Why?

Yours truly,

GEORGE W GRAVES.
